Mr. McCUMBER. Very well, Mr. President, I think the Senator, then, will agree with me that if the crop of wheat in 1915 was a little over 1,000,000,000 bushels and that in 1917 there was but a trifle over 500,000,000 bushels, or only about one-half of what the crop was in 1915, the farmers who only raised half a crop that year ought to be entitled to a better price for what they did raise; they ought, therefore, to have the benefit of the general law of supply and demand. Give them that and they will take their chances as to whether their crop will bring more or whether it will bring less. That is all the farmer is asking for.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a minute. As I have said, when you fix the price of the farmer's product you in all equity ought to fix the price of everything that the farmer has to buy, and you ought especially to fix the price of labor that goes into his product. Now, inasmuch as you have not fixed the price of any of the other articles, and inasmuch as the shortage of labor—if I may call it a "shortage," for the difficulty is not altogether due to shortage—has created such a demand that the price has doubled and trebled and quadrupled, it does seem to me that those conditions should be taken into consideration in fixing the price, if you are going to fix it, at which the farmer must sell his product.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think I am treating the Senator quite fairly in taking so much of his time——

Mr. McCUMBER. I am always glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. But I simply want to make this observation, and in my own time I will submit such further observations as I may care to make.

The Senator has spoken about the law of supply and demand. I recognize the fact that it is a well-established rule of political science that the law of supply and demand fixes prices, but I think we ought to add to it the qualification that it only fixes prices when it is permitted to operate, and I submit that during the last two years the law of supply and demand has not operated in this country either as to wheat or meal or corn or oats.

Mr. McCUMBER. What does fix the prices, then, will the Senator tell me?

Mr. POMERENE. A lot of hoarders and a lot of gamblers.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Government to-day has complete control over the question of monopolies. Does the Senator claim that the Government is not performing its duty to annihilate any person or any corporation that seeks to obtain a monopoly over food products? Is the Government failing?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think either the Government or the Congress or both have failed to perform their duty in this: An attempt has been made to regulate the price of wheat, but corn and oats and other competing cereals have been left in the open market where the prices have been advancing out of sight. Corn at such prices as we have now is simply a monstrous proposition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio now if the remedy he proposes is by law or regulation to reduce the price of corn and all the other cereals? Is that the remedy he proposes?

Mr. POMERENE. Why, Mr. President, I have said that I believe it is necessary to fix the price of wheat; I believe it is necessary to fix the price of corn; I believe it is necessary to fix the price of oats or of any other cereal.

Mr. REED. But that is not the question. The Senator has stated that the price of corn and the price of other cereals aside from wheat has gone out of all reason. Now, I want to ask him if the remedy he proposes is, instead of letting the price of wheat be advanced, to reduce the price of corn and of the other cereals?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I realize that the Senator from Missouri has very decided views upon this subject, and I do not believe that he and I could agree upon it at all; but we do know that before the price of wheat was fixed the price was up to $3 and $3.50 in certain localities, and the price of flour was up to $16, $17, and $18 a barrel. When we are fixing the price of a cereal which is necessary to sustain life, in my judgment it is necessary to keep it within reasonable bounds so as not to starve the people who are not producing cereals.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator declines to answer the very simple question I put to him. He is about to make a speech, so he has announced, upon this question. He comes from a great agricultural State, and I hope that when he comes to make his speech he will tell us whether the remedy he proposes is to reduce the price of corn and of rye and of barley, so that their price will be in proportion to the present wheat price; whether that is the remedy he proposes to give the farmer in lieu of giving the farmer an increase in the price of wheat. Now, while he is at it——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator refers to the fact that I am from an agricultural State; I am. I am also from an industrial State, and these suggestions do not embarrass me in the least.

Mr. REED. I am not endeavoring to embarrass the Senator; I am very much in earnest about getting this great question—I dislike to trespass upon the time of the Senator from North Dakota, but will the Senator pardon just one remark?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield; it is all illuminating.

Mr. REED. I am very much in earnest about getting this great question settled on what I think is a right basis, and I am very solicitious to secure, if possible, the very able help of the Senator from Ohio; and I assure him that when I referred to the fact that he is from a great agricultural State I did not mean, and could not possibly have meant, any reflection. Ohio is a great agricultural State; it is also a great industrial State; it is great in many ways; it has the Senator for its representative, and I was born in that State myself.

Mr. POMERENE. The State of Ohio is very proud of the latter fact, I assure the Senator.

Mr. REED. Jesting aside, I am asking this question in all seriousness and it must be answered seriously.

Mr. POMERENE. It will be so answered.

Mr. REED. It must be answered seriously by the Congress and by the American people, because if we make a mistake it may be a tragic mistake. Now, while the Senator is answering the proposition to which I have just referred, I hope he will in his speech answer another proposition. A moment ago he assigned hoarding as one of the causes for the price of $3.50 for wheat, which is rather high; I do not know of any $3.50 wheat myself. I am going to challenge the Senator, good-naturedly, of course, to point out where wheat was held in such quantities by hoarders that it seriously affected the price. I am going to ask him, when he examines the figures, to look and see whether in the great terminal markets at the time wheat was $3.50 a bushel there was not less wheat on hand in the great terminal markets than there had been at any similar period of the year for a number of years?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I again apologize to the Senator from North Dakota. My position, very briefly stated, is that when we started to fix the price of cereals we should have fixed the price of corn as well, and perhaps of oats and rye. That is my position; and, with that remark, I will not interrupt the Senator further, but in my own time will discuss the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator has just stated that his State is both an agricultural and an industrial State. Will the Senator kindly tell me what the average wage of the skilled workman is in the steel establishments of Ohio?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I can not give the Senator the price.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the wages would run all the way from $5 to $12 a day, would they not?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think that would fairly state the fact. It depends, of course, upon the kind of employment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. Then, I will average it at $9 a day. The Senator has complained about the poor people who receive only from $5 to $12 a day being compelled to buy flour that is manufactured from wheat that sold for $3.50 a bushel; and he says that that would bring the price of flour up to $18 a barrel. Well, as a matter of fact, each person in the United States consumes practically one barrel of flour a year. That means that a man working in the industrial field in the State of Ohio would work two days to buy all the flour that he would use for himself in 365 days. Now, does the Senator or any other person on the face of the earth know of a food product or anything else produced by human labor that is as cheap as white flour? It is the cheapest thing, compared with the amount of energy that is required to produce it, that you can get anywhere upon the face of the earth to-day, and that can be established without any possibility of question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to make this remark: I put in the RECORD a day or two ago some figures that were adduced before the Commerce Committee with reference to the wages paid in the shipyard at Hog Island, which were testified to be based upon the prices usually paid in Philadelphia and vicinity, and they were fixed by a Government board which was created for fixing wages on an equitable basis. Those wages had been preliminarily fixed, and, as so fixed, the average man in those yards, as I recall, even a common laborer, was making from $50 to $75 a week. A very large number of the employees—over 3,000—were averaging a good deal above $200 a month. Those who wanted it were being furnished a bed at 10 cents a night, and they were being fed excellent meals at 30 cents a meal; and, upon review, the same board added 20 per cent to all of those wages. I give the Senator those figures because they fit into the statement which he has just been making.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Missouri ought to have added one more word; he ought to have said that when they increased the rate of wage, the increase was made retroactive.

Mr. REED. Yes; it was made retroactive; that is correct.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator from Missouri should have also added the fact that the increase has recently been applied to the shipyards in the South, plus 20 per cent, and made retroactive so as to take effect last October.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Before this question passes I simply want to say that the farmers who produce wheat in North Dakota and in Ohio have to pay wages in competition with the wages mentioned by the Senator from Missouri, or else——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the point I was trying to make a short time ago.

Mr. GORE. Or else go without the help. It was testified before the Committee on Agriculture yesterday that in Minnesota last year the farmers were paying $35 a month to farm hands, and got the hands, while this year they are offering $60, with board and lodging, and are not getting the hands.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, one of the large farmers from my State was in my office this morning. He was trying to get help to do his seeding next spring and engage it beforehand, and he was talking with one of these I. W. W. bolsheviki fellows. I do not know what you may call them. He wanted $5 a day. The farmer said, "Well, I have got to have a man that will drive my gang plows and seeders." "How many horses do you use?" "I use five horses." This fellow said, "Have I got to hitch up those horses?" the farmer said, "Yes." The man replied, "I'll be d—d if I will hitch up five horses for any man for $5 a day." That gives you a little bit of an idea of the difficulty that the farmer encounters in attempting to secure help to-day to do his farm work.

The other day I gave a table showing what was paid to riveters out on the coast in the shipbuilding industry. They were paid $11.10 a day each. The average number of rivets driven by each was 51—$11.10 for driving 51 rivets in a day! Now, the Senator from Ohio perhaps thinks that those are a suffering people, and that it would be an injustice to them to allow the farmer to receive $2.50 a bushel.

The Senator thinks that wheat became high simply because there were monopolies handling it. Does not the Senator comprehend that in 1916 we raised, I think, but 558,000,000 bushels of wheat in the United States, just enough to feed our own people, and nothing to spare? We raised somewhat more in 1917. Now, notwithstanding the fact that we raised only enough to feed our own people under ordinary conditions, we shipped, or attempted to ship, a good many millions of bushels of wheat, some portion of which got over and some of which was fed to the sharks and swallowed up by the ocean. Now, necessarily, no one got the benefit of that wheat, but it reduced what was already a deficit to a greater deficit and necessarily increased the price.

All that the farmer asked, under those conditions, was: "Let me alone, and if I have got to compete for labor with establishments where a man will be paid $11.10 a day for driving 51 rivets, for heaven's sake allow me to get what the public is willing to pay for my product. I am not hoarding it." That is all he is asking.

Mr. President, we get right back to the main proposition: Do you want to raise wheat in the United States in the summer of 1918? You are bound to raise some, no matter whether you pass this law or not; but do you wish to raise enough so that we will have some to ship to our allies, and will have a sufficient amount to meet the home demand without having wheatless days? If you do, there is a way to do it. If you do not, just vote down this amendment.

Mr. President, it is not so much a question of what it costs to get something as it is a question of whether or not you are going to get it. Our allies would sooner pay $5 a bushel for wheat over in Great Britain, and be sure to get it, than to have the price fixed at 50 cents a bushel without any chance of getting it. They are not grumbling at the price they will have to pay. What they want is something to keep them from starving while they are fighting this battle; and they do not care what they have to pay for it, provided they get it. They are not paying for their wheat to-day anything in comparison with what they are paying for ammunition, measured by what it costs to produce each of those articles; and they are not grumbling because they are having to pay four and five and even ten times as much as they used to have to pay if they had bought shells in the United States.

All they say is, "Give us the shells at any price." They will also say, "Give us the wheat at any price, for all we want to be sure of is that we will get it." Now, we ought to produce it.

The Senator has spoken about corn. Our allies would be glad to get corn if they could use it, but corn will spoil before it is kept many days, after it has been ground, in a moist climate. Therefore they can not use American corn to any great extent to feed their soldiers and to feed their population over in Europe. They must have either rye or barley or wheat or oats; so if they get these articles they will be satisfied.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator might do well to mention this fact at this point, that the value of corn for food is only about two-thirds that of wheat, and that if we could ship corn instead of wheat to our allies in Europe it would take practically a third more shipping space.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is correct, and I will put in the RECORD something concerning that in a short time.

Now, to get at the facts that stare us in the face, I have given you the average yield of these cereals for the last 10 years. I am going to give you now what the farmer would receive for those cereals per acre under the present price.

With wheat at $2.20 a bushel, and an average yield of 14.7 bushels to the acre, the farmer would receive $32.34 for an acre. With corn at $1.85, he would receive $48.29 for each acre. Remember that he can leave his corn in the shock; he can leave it upon the stalk after it is ripened for a month or two months or three months, and then gather it, if it is sufficiently dry, and his family can do that work; whereas with wheat the moment it is ripe it must be cut, and it must be shocked and taken care of, and he must hire help if necessary.

Again, while from wheat he would receive $32 an acre, rye at $2.99 a bushel would give him $48.14 an acre. Barley would give him $54.45 an acre.

Now, will a farmer raise wheat—can you compel him to raise wheat, or if he is in his right senses would he naturally raise wheat—at $32 an acre, when he can get $54 an acre for raising barley, which is much easier to raise, and not only very much easier, but it assists him in cleaning up his land against foul stuff that will accumulate where you have cropped with wheat one year after another?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. At the present price of corn and barley?

Mr. McCUMBER. At the present terminal price of corn.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the section of the country from which I come there is a great deal of discussion going on and inquiries being made as to the cause for the abnormal price at which barley, rye, and oats, particularly, are held, and to some extent corn. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota if he can give me the information that will enable me to satisfy my correspondents that there is a legitimate reason for it, because I remember the time when barley and oats and rye and even corn were sold at one-third the price at which they are now held. There must be some good reason for it. Perhaps I ought to know it, and yet I should like the opinion of the Senator from North Dakota, who has studied these questions much more carefully than I have.

Mr. McCUMBER. First, Mr. President, with a world war on, as there is to-day, everything is in a feverish state, a state of uncertainty. All the warring nations want to get hold of all the grain that they can get hold of at any price. That of itself necessarily, irrespective of the general consumption of the world compared with its productiveness, would send prices skyward. Second, we do not get over to the old country every barrel of flour that we ship, or every bushel of wheat, or corn, or oats. I never have been able to secure from any one of the departments the proportionate part of our shipments that goes to the bottom of the ocean. That is kept secret, but we all know that it is very great. We know it from the fact that we know that most of these ships that are sunk carry food. Eighteen British ships, on an average, outside of their fishing vessels, are going down to the bottom of the ocean every week; and nearly every one of those ships has not only munitions but food products on it. Then, we will say there will be 10 other ships going down every week that belong to the allies and to neutrals, making from 28 to 30 shiploads of produce that are fed to the ocean every week. The Senator can see that any nation wanting to secure grain will keep its agents buying, buying, buying, all the time, as much as they can, the result naturally being to keep up the price.

Mr. GALLINGER. That can not apply to corn, inasmuch as the Senator has said already—which is true—that corn can not be transported, either in the raw state or in the manufactured state, and made use of in the European countries.

Mr. McCUMBER. The moment that one class of cereals becomes scarce or becomes exceptionally high, it immediately drives to a high point the price of everything else that can be used as a substitute, so that it would bring up the price of corn a great deal above what would be normal.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator proceeds further, after answering the question of the Senator from New Hampshire, I think it might be well to put in the RECORD at this time the fact that the advance in the price of the uncontrolled grain is no greater than the advance in the price of farm machinery. I will print in the RECORD, before the debate has closed, figures demonstrating that fact. They show that it is not a sporadic increase with respect to grain or farm products alone, but that it is a part of the general advance which characterizes everything that is uncontrolled.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator how it compares with cotton, for instance?

Mr. GORE. Cotton is a fit illustration; and I may say that, as I recall, in the list of 100 leading articles of which Bradstreet has kept a record for a number of years, farm products show a less increase than anything else. I believe that lead is the only commercial article which drops down among farm products as in the class which has advanced the least.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask permission to put into the RECORD at this time the table from which I have just quoted, giving the kinds of grain raised in the United States, the average yield per acre for the last 10 years, the price per bushel on March 9, 1918, and the yield in dollars per acre.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Kind of grain.	Average yield per acre of last 10 years.	Price per bushel on Mar. 9, 1918.	Yield in dollars per acre.
Wheat	14.7	$2.20	$32.34
Corn	26.1	1.85	48.29
Rye	16.1	2.99	48.14
Barley	24.2	2.25	54.45
Oats	31.2	.98	30.58

Mr. McCUMBER. In addition to that, Mr. President, I wish to put into the RECORD the number of calories in a bushel of wheat, a bushel of corn, a bushel of rye, of barley, and of oats, including the price of each of these bushels, showing how cheap, measured by the number of calories in a bushel, wheat is compared with all of the other grains.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	Price.
Wheat, 1 bushel, 60 pounds, 89,340 calories	$2.20
Corn, 1 bushel, 56 pounds, 88,032 calories	1.85
Rye, 1 bushel, 56 pounds, 84,448 calories	2.99
Barley, 1 bushel, 48 pounds, 70,796 calories	2.25
Oats, 1 bushel, 32 pounds, 41,920 calories	.98

Minneapolis quotations of March 9, 1918.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish also to insert in the RECORD another statement, showing the number of calories in 60 pounds of wheat, corn, rye, barley, and oats; and still another table, which will show just what a bushel of wheat will buy—in other words, what $2.20 will buy of calories in other grains.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	Cost.
60 pounds of wheat contain 89,340 calories	$2.20
60 pounds of corn contain 94,320 calories	2.00
60 pounds of rye contain 90,480 calories	3.20
60 pounds of barley contain 88,500 calories	2.80
60 pounds of oats contain 78,600 calories	1.84

62,135 calories of rye.
69,221 calories of barley.
94,005 calories of oats.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will quote this:

Two dollars and twenty cents will buy 89,340 calories of wheat; it will buy 104,684 calories of corn, 62,135 calories of rye, 69,221 calories of barley, and 94,005 calories of oats.

Wheat has already for the 1918 crop, been raised from $2 to $2.20 a bushel by the order of the President. We seek by this amendment to raise it to $2.50 a bushel at the local market, which perhaps would be equivalent to an increase of about 35 to 38 cents a bushel at the terminals.

Let us see the effect of this. It means everything in the world to the farmer who is going to produce this wheat. It would make a difference, we will say, of 30 cents a bushel. Do Senators stop to think how much difference that would make in the price of a loaf of bread? I gave a table in an address a short time ago showing that an increase of 10 cents a bushel on wheat, when converted into a loaf of bread, meant one thirty-second of 1 cent per loaf of bread. If you raise it to 30 cents a bushel that will be three times that or about one-tenth of 1 cent a loaf. While the increase of 30 cents a bushel would determine whether or not we would raise enough wheat to support ourselves and furnish some to the allies, it would mean an increase of only one-tenth of 1 cent a loaf to a man, and inasmuch as a family of five consume about four loaves of bread a day upon the average it would be four times that, or 4 mills, or less than one-half of 1 cent a day for a whole family. That is exactly what it means. That is the awful imposition upon the laboring man who is receiving $11 a day and is 50 per cent efficient by the farmer in asking $2.50 per bushel for his grain.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps it is my own fault that I do not know definitely the proper answer to give to the question I am going to propound, but I have been a very busy man during this session.

I am going to ask the Senator if, after the price of wheat has been fixed, the price of bread has been or will be fixed? In other words, after this increase in the price of wheat is established, can the men who produce bread fix their price, and increase it at their own sweet will, or not?

I do not know but that Mr. Hoover has fixed the price of bread. They are doing such extraordinary things that I am bound to confess my ignorance.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, he has in a way fixed the price of bread, the same as he has in a way fixed the price of a great many other articles. For instance, there will be published I think in practically every morning newspaper, or at least once a week, a list of articles, stating the prices that the consumers here in the city of Washington should pay. That list includes bread and beans and pork and everything else; and in addition to that, at the bottom of this table, there is printed a request that if any greater charges are made against anyone they will report the fact to the board. The board has, of course, already had hearings with these people and has told them what they could charge and had a right to charge; and I think for the most part they are conforming to the requirements of the board.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust that is so, Mr. President, although I think the general consuming public pay mighty little attention to those tables in the morning papers, or in the evening papers, for that matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think a great many of the sellers make excuses that they are just out of those articles.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one other observation; and I do not make this in antagonism to the position the Senator takes. It is not quite fair, however, to cite the abnormal wages that are being paid at Hog Island, or on the Pacific coast, or anywhere else where Government contracts have been made in what I regard as a very reckless and indefensible way. There are multitudes of people all over the country who do not receive those wages and who do consume flour. Every pound of flour that is used in New England comes from the West. We scarcely raise a bushel of wheat in New England at the present time, and it would be a losing venture to undertake to raise it, although some of our farmers did experiment a little in that direction last year; but the people who consume that flour are people getting very moderate wages, as a rule. They are the men and women in our textile industries, who get what has been denounced on this floor a score of times as a ridiculously low wage.

Mr. McCUMBER. How much?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not tell the Senator exactly how much, but they are not any such wages as have been quoted for these governmental industries; and the ordinary people are working for wages a little higher than they got a year or two or three years ago, but nevertheless they are normal wages. So that in considering the question, it is right that we should look at this question by and large and not say that a man is getting $11.25 a day somewhere, and hence he can afford to buy flour.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose he is getting $5 a day?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, we do not pay that, as a rule. I suppose, probably, the wages in the textile industries in this country not only in New England but throughout the country, taking the men and women who are employed—and they are largely women—would be less than $2 a day. I think probably that is true. They should be considered in this matter; and even if they pay but one-tenth of a cent increase on a loaf of bread, with the abnormal prices of everything that they purchase in the line of furniture and clothing and everything else, even that may be a burden.

I do not suppose anybody will agree with me that we ought to consider this at all; but the average man and woman dependent upon the West for their wheat and their flour are considering it, and I think it is very natural that they should.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have stated that if you put the flour up to $15 a barrel, or even as high as $18 a barrel, one barrel lasts one individual one year; and I insist that giving two or three or four or even five days' labor in a year for all the flour that that individual will consume is not an imposition upon him. The great trouble is that the farmers have been producing these products so long for a price that gave them a mere existence, and we are so in the habit of getting their products without any profit whatsoever to them, that we feel that they must continue to be the benefactors of the world, and furnish their products at the same inadequate prices, while the people with whom they are dealing are receiving two and three and four times as much as they did in previous years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota further yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I am a reasonably good friend of the farmer.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is a good friend of everyone.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was born on a farm and I have been in sympathy with the farming population, and yet am I mistaken in the information that has come to me and the pictures that I have studied in magazines and newspapers that the farmers of the West, as a rule, are very prosperous at the present time, having more automobiles per family than almost any other class of the community, either West or East or in the Middle States? Am I mistaken about that?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the newspapers and magazines are imposing upon the American people.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me state the situation to the Senator. The farmer has to come to town once in a while.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The farmer will have to pay from $350 to $400 for a span of horses. The farmer could buy a Ford car last year for $360—less than he would pay for a span of horses. The Ford would not be eating off its head during the winter months. It would pay him from the standpoint of dollars and cents if he had much running to town, if he lived 6 or 8 miles out, to use gasoline, even at the prices he has been paying, and use an auto; and he had to economize where he could get credit to buy the auto on three falls' time. He had to economize in every possible way that he could, and it was greater economy to use the Ford for the driving around than it was to use horses, and he has to use one of the two. Therefore the automobile proposition is not one that cuts a great deal of figure, any more than the fact that it pays him better, perhaps, to get a tractor to plow with than it would to pay $5 a day for a man to drive three horses.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that is one side of the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The other is that because of the universal use of automobiles we have to build nitrate plants in this country to supply the farmer with fertilizer.

Now, I do not think I was mistaken about that. I was in the Senator's State about 20 years ago, I think—possibly not more than 15 years ago—and I had some farms pointed out to me near Devils Lake that I could have bought, if I had had any money to buy them with—which unfortunately was not the case—for about $8 or $10 an acre.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the Senator would have had less money now if he had bought them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am told that they are selling now for $100 an acre. I was told so by North Dakota men. I do not know whether that is correct or not, and I suppose there have been some taxes paid on them, but of course they have raised crops all that time. So I may be mistaken about this; I may have been imposed upon; but while possibly the price of the farmer's wheat ought to be increased—I am not arguing that proposition now at all—I have been told, and I have been led to believe, that the farmers of these great agricultural States—and I have rejoiced in that fact, if it is a fact—have made a great deal of money in the last 10 or 15 years, especially the last 10 years.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me tell the Senator what the facts are. If the Senator would go into the county records and find the number of mortgages there are upon these lands, he would probably be astounded, but all this high-priced land is covered with mortgages that have to be paid. I do not suppose there is one farm in twenty in my State that is free from mortgage, taking the State through. I may be in error. My colleague keeps better acquainted with those matters than I do. There are so many mortgages in the United States and the farmers were having such a hard time to pay interest that the Government had to establish a rural bank system to help them out. That is some evidence of the fact that they had to borrow money. That is some evidence of the fact that they could not pay the interest that was being charged them. The Senator assisted with that bill, which I do not think was a very good one, because I think when you get through with it it will cost the Government the difference between what the farmer saves and what he was paying before, and possibly the Government might as well have made it in a direct gift. But, as a matter of fact, the farms are not paying very well.

Now, let me give the Senator another condition. We have a great many foreigners—that is, they were foreigners—in my State. They were from the Odessa country and other portions of Russia and Bohemia and sections of Germany. How do they farm? The wife does the shopping. The little girls that are 10 and 12 years old can pull a bundle of grain, and you will see them at work. The wife and every woman and every boy and child is at work. When they first come over here they live just about the same as they did in Russia, just as economically. They spend nothing unless they are compelled to spend it. They therefore are enabled to save what they do raise as a rule. Those people have been getting ahead. They have been getting ahead only because they have not lived up to the standard of American living.

Now, I want the American farmer to live just exactly as the rest of the average population of the United States. I want him to have a right to buy a Ford if he can and ride in it to town, and I think it is proper for him to do it. Those are the only people who have gotten ahead. Land has gone up, not that it will produce any more, but that it is getting scarce.

Now, let the Senator go and buy one of those farms at $100 an acre. Suppose he has to pay 6 and 7 per cent for his money to buy it with and charge that up, as you would if you invested the same sum in a mercantile establishment. Then make an allowance for yourself as overseer. Then pay your wife what is being paid to your colored cook here in the city; pay as much to your daughter as you would pay a colored girl waiting on your table, and pay to your son one-half what you would pay to your chauffer here in the city driving a car, and where will you end at the close of a year? It will depend on exactly what your credit is. If you are considered honest and have a credit, you may borrow enough money to live over the next year, but you will not make it off your $100-an-acre farm in my State or anywhere else I know of where you have to hire labor.

Mr. President, we want to raise wheat. I do not care whether it is two or three dollars or five dollars a bushel, the main thing is to raise wheat and get it raised.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. You can not expect this farmer who can get $48 or $53 an acre for what rye and barley he can raise to sow his land to wheat, when he can only get $32 an acre and when he is bound to run behind in raising the wheat. I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he does not think it economy even to the housewives in New Hampshire if we would fix the price of wheat high enough to insure a sufficient supply of wheat and thus enable us to cut out the order requiring the housewife to buy a pound of trash with a pound of flour? That involves double waste. It forces the housewife to gather into her pantry stuff she does not need. On the other hand, there is an artificial demand for those articles that raises the price to people who do want them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very much interested in the Senator's argument, and I agree with him very fully. It is noticeable that every time the Food Commission recommends a substitute for wheat or for some kinds of meat the substitute advances in price until it reaches the price of the thing desired to save. It is a good illustration of the effect of the law of supply and demand when untrammeled.

What I interrupted the Senator for was to say that some time before Mr. Hoover assumed his duties as food commissioner I had a talk with him, together with other gentlemen who were present, with regard to the manner in which he intended to control prices, and this was his reply in substance, that given reasonable appropriations for the purpose he could buy the surplus wheat of the country and store it away, go to Cuba and buy practically all the sugar product of Cuba and store that away, and then when prices threatened to rise above a proper level, everything considered, they could be equalized by letting some of the Government stores loose and go upon the market, the taxpayers, of course, paying the difference, if any, and by that means keep prices either upon or at a reasonable level. It was due to that purpose which caused me to give such support as I did to the so-called food and fuel conservation bill, and it is the only way, in my judgment, in which the Government can exercise price control with any degree of success, because, as the Senator says, while the Government can fix a price it can not force the producer to raise the substance about which the price is fixed unless he can do so at a profit.

The situation is vividly illustrated now in my State, where the fuel commissioner has fixed a price for coal that makes it impossible for the small, independent miner to produce coal except at a loss. As a result, during the last week, 52 mines have shut down, and as a consequence our coal output is reduced more than 18,000 tons a day. It is a good illustration of the manner in which arbitrary interferences with the law of nature—I think I do not go too far in calling it that—will result. You can lead a horse to the trough, but no power on earth that I know of can make him drink.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator. I think it ought to be said here on the floor at this time by myself, that I believe considerable has come out of the orders with reference to wheatless days and the requirements to mix barley with bread, because I think it saves wheat to use the graham flour and other flours. I think that is a saving. Whether the whole amount when added together will represent any considerable number of bushels I am not prepared to say, but undoubtedly it will have some beneficial effect in saving the consumption of wheat in the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will yield for a moment further——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I think I should add the statement that in my opinion that was, and to-day would be, Mr. Hoover's plan if he had executed it in accordance with his own judgment. I think there have been some interferences which have resulted in the arbitrary fixing of prices for certain necessities of life which have produced bad consequences.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. It is seldom that I differ with the conclusions of my colleague, but I have to do so at this time. I do not know that I differ only I have information which perhaps he has not received. It is true that we have been conserving wheat by wheatless days, but for the last four or five weeks witnesses have appeared before the Committee on Agriculture. Some 20 different farmers' organizations have been represented, and the testimony goes to show that while we are having wheatless days and conserving wheat by keeping it away from the human family there are millions of bushels being fed to animals.

Mr. McCUMBER. Because it is cheaper.

Mr. GRONNA. Because it is cheaper than any other grain. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that I do not think we have conserved any wheat.

Mr. McCUMBER. But that was not due so much to the matter of the wheatless days as it would be due directly to fixing a price for wheat much lower in comparison with the real value than that of other cereals.

Mr. GRONNA. That is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. In that respect I think my colleague is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not interrupt the Senator at all——

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Were it not that this is a matter which appeals to me, and I am seeking information.

The Senator from Oklahoma propounded the interrogatory as to whether or not it would be better for the housewives of New England to have more wheat and not be compelled to buy something they did not want when they bought something they did want, as seems to be the case at the present time throughout the country, I judge; it certainly is so in Washington, where I know we are compelled to buy a certain amount of cereals if we buy a certain amount of wheat flour. If those who buy shredded wheat biscuit when they buy a certain amount of wheat flour will examine the package, they will find that they get about two-thirds the shredded wheat they got a few months ago. That has escaped the attention of Mr. Hoover, I imagine. I think that Mr. Hoover is making the most foolish orders that have ever been issued. I will not express my view about Mr. Hoover and his administration because it might not be parliamentary if I did so. I have not any faith in it at all.

One other point, however, the Senator has brought out, and that is the mortgages on the farms of the West. Mr. President, if there is a piece of property in the city of Washington that has not a deed of trust on it, equivalent to our mortgages in the East and the West, I think men will have to hunt some little time to find it. Of course there are properties that are not mortgaged, but as a rule they are mortgaged in almost every instance.

One other point. The Senator applauds the fact, and I agree with him, that the farmer can afford to buy Ford cars and dispense with the use of horses. That is the very thing that is troubling our people in the East. How does it happen that the horse has been almost extinguished as a draft animal and as an animal for pleasure, and at the same time what we buy from the West to feed the few horses we keep in the East has increased in price three times, such as corn.

I happen to own a couple of horses for my amusement, and I do not own at my home a car of any description. A letter that I received only yesterday stated that "the price of corn and oats is so high that I hesitate to buy it," and I know that the small farmers of New Hampshire to-day are sending their hens to the Boston market and disposing of them because they can not afford to buy grain to feed them and they do not get an adequate return from the eggs and the poultry that they sell.

Now, that is what puzzles me. As I said, the horse has been almost extinguished as a draft animal and as an animal for pleasure, and at the same time the price of what we feed to horses has increased to such an abnormal amount that those who have horses hesitate to make the purchase.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator would follow the investigation just a little further he would get the solution of the whole problem. Go to that farmer in New Hampshire and ask him why he does not raise more of this article and that article, and what will his answer be? "I have got to raise it with labor. The prices that are now being paid to labor in your cities and in all work, directly for the Government or indirectly for war purposes, are so extraordinarily high that I can not pay the price and make anything even at the price that I may receive. Therefore I must quit raising." Therefore there will be a deficit in the market of those particular products, and that necessarily will raise the price. So it all gets right back to the question of the extraordinary price that is being paid for labor.

The Senator spoke of Hog Island. I have been told that the conditions which were prevailing at Hog Island and which were explained before the Committee on Commerce have been practically cured. Now, maybe that has been the case at Hog Island. I talked with a contractor yesterday who the day before had visited one of the important ship-constructing plants at Wilmington, Del. He related to me and to others in my presence that he had gone on the upper deck, where there were about 100 workmen at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and not more than 5 or 6 of those men were working at all. They were just simply lying idle, and probably receiving a dollar an hour at least, and possibly higher than that. Can the farmer lure those men who are basking in the sunshine on these ships, and who are spending so much of their time doing nothing, and expect to get them at the same price upon the farm?

The labor market is shot to pieces. We are not getting efficiency in the production of scarcely anything in the United States to-day. The farmer is suffering because of that fact.

Now, let me state another matter that bears upon this question. Under your present system of raising money to buy liberty bonds you divide the country up into sections and you draw from the several sections according to the capitalization of the banks. Now, look at the States of North Dakota, Minnesota, South Dakota, Eastern Montana, Iowa, and the wheat-raising section generally.

In my State, with a failure of the wheat crop practically in two-thirds of the State for two years, the banks are called upon to subscribe for these liberty bonds. They have been so far able to meet the demands. They must not only subscribe for those bonds, but they must also lend money to the counties or to the farmers to buy seed grain to seed the land where there was a complete failure for a year or two past. Every dollar that is taken for the liberty bonds is taken out of those States. Where does it go? It goes into the State of Ohio, into the State of New Hampshire, into all the Eastern States and Middle States where there is any manufacturing, and there it is literally burned up in the exorbitant sums that are paid for labor and paid for material furnished. So the people in these latter States who are also taxed to buy liberty bonds get the money right back into their own section again. Now, that increases the price of labor. It increases the demand for labor in that section, and of course prevents the farmer in my section from getting labor unless he pays these enormous prices. As he can not compete with these manufacturers, he can not get the labor. Not only that, but his own boys leave the farms for this greater remuneration.

There is the condition we have to meet. How are we going to meet it? We ought to meet it by being allowed either to sell our products for what they are worth in the market, or if you are going to fix a price on any of these products fix a price at least sufficiently high so that with what labor we perform ourselves on the farm and what we can hire in addition, at these exorbitant wages, it will allow us a reasonable return upon our investment and a little profit. That is why we are asking that the price of wheat be fixed at $2.50 a bushel.

Mr. President, I want to have read here a letter that I received from a gentleman who is farming in my county and which I think presents the matter very justly and fairly. He is a patriotic man, because he says he is going to raise wheat for this country even though he can make a great deal more if he raises anything else. I admit that his patriotism may be challenged a little, from the fact that the renter has to suffer the greater loss, but he also will suffer loss.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NORTHWESTERN CADILLAC CO.,
Minneapolis, Minn., March 8, 1918.

DEAR MR. McCUMBER: Rye is selling for $3 a bushel on the local exchange, barley is selling for 8 or 10 cents more than wheat, and corn at almost as much as wheat. If these prices continue, the farmers claim that wheat is the cheapest grain they can feed their stock.

It seems to me that the Food Commission is overreaching itself in fixing a price of $2.20 on wheat and still urging the farmers to put in a big acreage. Even, if the wheat is raised it will not be sold if coarse grains continue at their present high prices. Wheat is the riskiest crop that the farmer can raise. Iowa farmers have found out that it pays better to raise corn even at half the price of wheat. For 10 years there has been a propaganda in North Dakota urging the farmers to diversify. Now the Food Commission comes along urging the North Dakota farmer to plant more wheat, which works not only to the detriment of his land but of his pocketbook and nullifies the beneficial effects of the propaganda for diversifying.

If the farmer plants more wheat it certainly is from purely patriotic motives, as he certainly can have no other. It would be patriotic for him to plant more wheat even if the price of wheat compared favorably with other grains, for it is very bad for the land, as you know, especially land that has been raising wheat for 30 years or more; but in addition to this, the Government penalizes the patriotic farmer by fixing the price of his wheat at a dollar or a dollar and a half less than it would sell on the market. Three dollars or three dollars and a half would not be too high for wheat considering the price of other crops, such as cotton, corn, etc.

I noticed in one of our local papers the other day that there were many eastern buyers in Minneapolis buying up dry goods and shipping them back East where they came from. The article went on to say that the prices of many forms of dry goods were two or three times what they were a few years ago. Everything that the farmer has to buy is doubled or trebled. Feed for horses, to take just one item, is three times as high as a few years ago.

I am a great believer in allowing supply and demand to fix the price of merchandise. If any one article is unreasonably high people will immediately turn to something else. If the Government has to have wheat for export why does it not allow the farmers a price which will compensate them for their risk and for the damage to their land. If the price of wheat flour is high, people will use less of it.

On our farm we are going to put in 50 per cent more wheat than we did last year regardless of Government action. As you know, the price of wheat, whether it is two or three dollars would not make any vital difference to me, but it makes a big difference to our renter, who pays all the expenses and does all the work. He could make double the money by planting this acreage with almost anything else.

If wheat is to remain at $2.20 everything that the farmer buys should be regulated to correspond. As this is impossible, it seems to me that the fair thing to do is to fix the price of wheat somewhere near its relative value. I can not see how this would disturb the present conditions or conditions until next July anyway. The price on the old crop could remain at its present price and the new price to affect new wheat only. Under such conditions, after seeding, all the old wheat in the country will come on the market.

I presume there is nothing new in this letter for you, but I felt that I ought to write you on account of my personal experience with North Dakota farming. It is an actual fact that the man who is running our farm is not a dollar ahead for the past two years of hard work, in spite of the comparatively high prices prevailing. Crops have been poor and expenses greater than ever.

Mr. McCUMBER. That letter is written by one who is farming in the Red River Valley, where they had no failure last year, but a fairly average good crop in 1917.

Mr. GRONNA. It is a favorite section of the State.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; it is a favorite section, as my colleague says, of the State. Yet, even with the prices that were being paid he has not gotten ahead during this last year.

Now, Mr. President, in closing let me say——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Did I understand the Senator to say he was closing?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I desire to close now.

Mr. GORE. I was going to suggest to the Senator that I presume it would be just as well to adjourn until Monday and let him finish then. A good many Senators here have expressed a desire, it being Saturday evening, to adjourn; but if the Senator is on the edge of closing I will not make the suggestion now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well, Mr. President. This is simply a question of either letting the price alone entirely if you want to produce wheat or else allow a price that will somewhat compare with the prices that are fixed by the law of supply and demand on other articles.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, for the reasons suggested a minute ago, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 18, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 16, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, to whom we have been taught by the Master to look up in faith and confidence, and call Thee by the endearing name Father, which is altogether reassuring, quicken, we pray Thee, our activities and efficiency in the work whereunto Thou hast called us, that we may be faithful servants in the furtherance of the eternal plans which Thou hast ordained, and which in spite of the untoward circumstances of life Thou shalt in Thine own good time accomplish, to Thy glory and to the good of Thy children—

> That nothing walks with aimless feet,
> That not one life shall be destroyed
> Or cast as rubbish to the void,
> When God hath made the pile complete.

And all praise shall be Thine, in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ANONYMOUS BILL.

The SPEAKER. Some gentleman, without writing his name on it, filed a bill providing pensions at the rate of $30, $32, $35, $38, and $40. Who is the author of the bill?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that it had passed Senate bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars others than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 3476. An act to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army; and

S. 4099. An act to amend and reenact section 5200, Revised Statutes of the United States.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANT SECRETARIES OF WAR.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9352) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for an Assistant Secretary of War," approved March 5, 1890, and for other purposes, my purpose being to move to concur in the Senate amendments.

I will state that the bill as it passed the House was drafted by the War Department, and after it passed the House it was discovered that unintentionally the salary of the present Assistant Secretary had been reduced from $5,000 to $4,500. Except in the Department of Justice all Assistant Secretaries get $5,000 a year, and it was not intended to reduce the salary of the present Assistant.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman a question if I may. There was so much confusion here and I do not know that I quite understood him, and I want to be put right. My understanding is that the two gentlemen who will be affected by the passage of this bill are already in office and receiving compensation at the rate of $4,500 a year, and refuse to serve longer unless their salaries are increased to $5,000, which will be accomplished by the passage of this bill. Am I correct?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is entirely incorrect about that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then I want to be corrected.

Mr. DENT. I can not say who will be appointed. I have no private or inside information, and have not had the curiosity even to ask——

Mr. WALSH. Did not the gentleman——

Mr. DENT. Let me answer the gentleman from Minnesota. I have not even had the curiosity to ask who would be appointed to these additional places. I do not know whether the gentlemen who are now receiving $4,500 will be appointed or not. The law simply provides for these two additional Assistant Secretaries, to get $4,500, but in the bill as drafted in the War Department, and as passed unanimously by the House here about a week or 10 days ago, unintentionally the salary of the present Assistant Secretary of War, an office that has been in existence for many years, was reduced from $5,000, which he is now receiving, to $4,500. It is the purpose simply to correct that mistake, and the Senate amendment, as I understand, does it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course nobody would want to see the salary of the present Assistant reduced. May I go further and inquire, does this bill really create, then, two new Assistant Secretaries in the War Department?

Mr. DENT. The House has already decided that it does. The War Department has requested it and the Senate has agreed. The War Department, which is perhaps the most overworked department now in Washington, has but one Assistant Secretary of War. This bill has already passed the House unanimously a week or 10 days ago.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. One further inquiry. Can the gentleman inform the House whether or not it is the intention of the present Secretary of War to remain permanently in France, so that this newly created office is necessary for that reason? I ask that in good faith, because it has been stated that he is going to remain on the War Board.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that my information is that the Secretary does not intend to remain permanently in France.

Mr. MONDELL. The purpose and effect of the Senate amendment, as I understand, is simply to restore the present salary of the Assistant Secretary?

Mr. DENT. Of the present Assistant Secretary, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the purpose of the Senate amendment, it goes further and provides $5,000 for these two additional Assistant Secretaries of War. The present Assistant Secretary of War receives $5,000. As I remember from looking over the bill as it was returned from the Senate, for these two additional secretaries it increases the amount from $4,500 to $5,000.

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. If I am mistaken as to this, it is due to my misunderstanding of the Senate report.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman in regard to a matter which has been in the public press very much here of late, especially yesterday and the last few days, with reference to legislation recommended by the Surgeon General for what he says are the needs of the Medical Department of the Reserve Corps and Medical Corps, as to efficiency; and I will ask the gentleman if he knows what the attitude of the War Department is in reference to this Assistant Secretary of War who is now acting Secretary of War?

Mr. DENT. Of course, that has absolutely nothing to do with the matter now pending before the House. The gentleman was in my office this morning, and I stated to him very frankly that there was a conflict of opinion on the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—I merely wish to state to the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that I have just reexamined the amendment as passed by the Senate, and the purpose is, as I stated to the gentleman, to increase the salaries of these two new Assistant Secretaries from $4,000 to $5,000. The existing salary of the present Assistant Secretary of war is $5,000, but this bill has nothing to do as to his salary. It merely creates two additional Assistant Secretaries of War, and instead of the salary as carried in the original bill being $4,500 the Senate amendment changes it to $5,000.

Mr. DENT. I may have misunderstood the Senate report. If so, I plead guilty in not comparing the report with the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object.

INDUSTRIAL CREDITS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10608) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes; and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled equally—one half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the other half by myself.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman wish to fix any limit on the general debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. As far as the time is concerned, it is my desire to let it run on.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is it probable that the general debate will run all of to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; certainly all of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 10608, and in the meantime he asks that in the general debate he control one-half of the time and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] one-half the time on the other side.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from North Carolina are both in favor of the bill. I want to know who those opposed to the bill are going to get time from.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman from California that he will be given ample time, as well as those who are opposed to the bill. I am sure the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] will join me in that statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am perfectly willing, and think it just that those who are opposed to the bill have equal time and that they should be alternated with those who are in favor of the bill. I am perfectly willing to divide the time with the gentleman from North Carolina and give the gentleman from California and those opposed to the bill ample time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10608) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on February 4 of this year I introduced House bill 9499, known as the War Finance Corporation bill. It was introduced as an administration measure, just as it was prepared by the Treasury Department. Since its introduction the Ways and Means Committee has been giving most diligent study and investigation to the provisions of the bill. As a result of our study and deliberation, so many amendments to the original bill were made in committee that the committee thought it better and wiser that a new bill containing such changes should be introduced. Accordingly, I was instructed to introduce House bill 10608, now known as the War Finance Corporation bill. This bill comes before you with the unanimous report of the committee, but it must not be understood that the committee, or any member of it, would sanction such a bill in times of peace. Not one would favor it. We report and present it strictly as a war measure, deemed necessary by the administration and the committee.

The bill, even in its present shape, as well as the original, is so radical, so unprecedented, and, I may say, economically so revolutionary, that the mind of the most radical would hesitate to indorse it at first blush. But the more we studied the bill, the more we investigated its purpose and effect, the more we contemplated the real situation that confronts the country, its wisdom and necessity as an emergency measure appealed to us, and I think the bill as amended will appeal to the judgment of the House and the country.

This situation confronts the Nation: The administration—the war prosecuting branch of the Government—is convinced, and from the evidence before it your committee is convinced, that for the more effective prosecution of the war the time has come when it is absolutely necessary for the Government in some way to go to the rescue of the industries whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. If it withholds financial help, then the Government must of necessity take over or commandeer the war industries of the country, including, perhaps, many public utilities, power plants, and so forth, and manage and operate them, putting up all the funds for investments and operation. We are decidedly of the opinion that it is better and wiser for the Government to assist to some extent in providing money and credits for such industries than to take them over.

There are three ways by which the Government can render the necessary assistance:

First, by direct advances and loans by the Treasury. No thoughtful man would suggest adoption of this method. Billions of additional bonds and taxes would have to be issued and raised.

Second, by investing the Federal reserve bank system, through the Federal Reserve Board, with the powers and functions necessary to effectuate the purposes of the bill. After due consideration this method did not appeal to our best judgment. To throw upon the Federal reserve system the vast powers and responsibilities contained in the bill or those necessary to carry out the objects of the bill would be a burden too immense to be added to its shoulders. It would be unable to efficiently perform both the large and responsible duties now devolving upon it and the many and important duties proposed in the scheme of this bill. We desired, too, to maintain as far as possible this great system in its integrity without impairing its principal function of promoting and facilitating active commercial transactions.

Everyone really interested in maintaining the Federal Reserve System in its integrity, and confining it to its primary and essential functions as far as possible, will readily see the danger of the vast and extraordinary powers and functions proposed in the bill overcoming and swallowing up the Federal Reserve System itself.

If, therefore, it is unwise to provide the necessary aid directly from the Treasury by raising more taxes and issuing more bonds, and if it is unwise to take care of the war industries through the Federal Reserve System, then, as the third way of providing the needed assistance, there must be created another and a new agency by which such assistance can be rendered. This bill proposes that new agency by creating the War Finance Corporation. At once we all see the necessity of coming to the rescue of the war industries. The Government has gone out and by its continual sale of liberty bonds barred up almost every avenue of credit. It has almost exhausted, and will continue during this war to exhaust, the surplus loanable funds of the banks throughout the country by its continuous flow of issues of certificates of indebtedness. There are outstanding to-day about two billion and a half dollars of certificates of indebtedness payable on or before June 25, 1918. These certificates are issued from time to time during the year and the banks take them up, but under the law they can not be issued for a longer period than a year. Some are for 90 days, some for 4 months, and some for 6 months, and so forth, and the banks are continually appealed to to supply this enormous amount of money for the Government. We can understand very readily how the Government has affected both the money and credit market.

I do not think the necessity for this legislation or some sort of legislation to give relief, can be more clearly expressed than the Secretary of the Treasury did in his testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means. He said:

> The Government's borrowings, particularly during the period immediately preceding and following each liberty loan, have tended to preempt the credit facilities of the banks and often to prevent them from giving needed and customary help to quasi-public and private enterprises. Many instances have been brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Federal Reserve Board where industrial plants, public utilities, power plants, railroads, and others have found difficult, if not impossible, to obtain the necessary advances to enable them to perform vital service in connection with the war because essential credits, ordinarily available to them, are being absorbed by the Government itself.

I will now explain the bill and its provisions. It contains three titles. Title I relates to the War Finance Corporation. Title II relates to the Capital Issues Committee.

Title III relates to Miscellaneous—the saving and repealing clauses, and the penalty clause. It also contains a provision exempting from the stamp tax any note or notes secured by liberty bonds and certificates of indebtedness.

Title I. War Finance Corporation.—The corporation is named by the bill the War Finance Corporation. It is given the ordinary powers of a corporation, to adopt, alter, and use a seal; to sue and be sued; to acquire and lease lands; to make contracts; to appoint and fix compensation of officers, attorneys, agents, employees; to make by-laws, and so forth, necessary to the transaction of its business.

The life of the corporation is 10 years, but it is not authorized to do any business or exercise any powers given to it by the bill after six months after the termination of the war except to wind up its affairs and liquidate its assets. Its principal office is to be in Washington, but it may establish agencies or branch offices in any city or cities in the United States.

It has one stockholder and only one—the United States. Five hundred million dollars is the amount of the capital stock, to be paid in from time to time as called for by the board of directors with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The management of the corporation is vested in a board of five directors. The Secretary of the Treasury is to be chairman and the four other members are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, two for a term of two years and two for a term of four years. We have provided, in order to assure the country that the directorate shall be nonpartisan, that not more than three members of the five directors shall be of the same political party. The salary of these directors is not to exceed $12,000 a year. It is no bar for appointment that one is already an officer of the Government. He can remain such officer and be a director, but his salary as such officer and director, combined, can not exceed the salary fixed for a director; that is, can not exceed $12,000. It is also provided in the bill that each director shall give his entire time to the business of the corporation, except such time as he devotes to the Government in his other official capacity, and that no director or officer of the corporation shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interest or the interests of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested.

The corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an amount equal to four times the amount of its capital stock paid in and with a maturity of not less than one nor more than five years. The original bill authorized an issue of eight times. Under the original bill $4,000,000,000 of bonds could be issued and be outstanding at any one time if the total amount of capital stock; that is, the $500,000,000, had been paid in. In this bill we have limited the total amount of outstanding issues to $2,000,000,000 when the whole capital stock has been paid in. The amount that can be issued and outstanding at any one time is four times the amount of the capital stock then paid in.

That is, if an installment of only $100,000,000 is paid in the corporation is authorized to issue and have outstanding only $400,000,000 of its bonds. If $250,000,000 of the capital stock is paid in, it is authorized to issue and have outstanding $1,000,000,000 of bonds, and when the whole $500,000,000, it can then issue and have outstanding $2,000,000,000 of bonds—the amount limited. I may here say that the corporation will probably make the larger part of its loans or advances by its bonds instead of money. For instance, a corporation with proper securities applies to the War Finance Corporation for a loan of $1,000,000. The finance corporation has not the money, and it does not want to go to the trouble and expense of going out in the market and selling its bonds. It will advance to the applicant $1,000,000 of its bonds, and then the applying corporation will go out and sell or go to the banks and borrow with these bonds pledged as security, as they will be of superior security, the funds needed.

Now, as to the power of the corporation to make loans or advances. Such loans or advances may be divided into three classes:

First, to any bank, banker, or trust company, which shall have made since April 6, 1917, and which shall have outstanding any loan or loans to, or which shall have purchased since such date and own at time of the advance, any bonds or obligations of any person, firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business in the United States whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, such advances to be for a period not to exceed five years. It is contemplated that most of the business, most of the loans to the war industries, will go through the banking channels. The advances will, for the most part, be made by the corporation to the banks, which in turn will make loans to the war industries. In this way the corporation will have not only the note or obligation of the borrowing industry and the securities which the bank requires of it, but the note or obligation of the bank and such other securities as the corporation may require of the bank. Thus the bank stands between the corporation and the borrower as an additional protection and making an additional security to the bonds of the corporation, to which I shall later refer.

Take a munition company as an illustration. It needs $1,000,000 and applies to its bank for it. The bank, not having sufficient funds, takes the company's note and the securities it requires of the company and applies to the corporation. The corporation, if it is satisfied the securities are adequate, will advance to the bank 75 per cent of the loan which the bank makes to the company, but the bank must give its note, secured by the company's note to it and all the securities pledged by the company to the bank.

In cases like the one just given, where the bank gives its note, secured by the obligation of the borrower and the securities he pledges, the corporation is authorized to advance to the bank not to exceed 75 per cent of its loan to the war-industry borrower.

However, the directors are authorized to advance 100 per cent of the bank's loan—the total amount—but when they do that the bank must put up not only its note and the note of the borrower and his securities, but additional securities amounting to at least 33 per cent of the amount of the advance.

The corporation can advance to a bank or banking institution or trust company that has gone out and bought bonds or obligations since the declaration of war of any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war 75 per cent of the market value of such bonds or obligations, but the bank must make its note secured by such bonds or obligations. The corporation is authorized to advance 100 per cent of the market value of such bonds or obligations provided the bank will put up in addition to the securities just mentioned securities amounting to 33 per cent of the advance. Under the class of advances which I have been discussing it will be observed that the fundamental condition of the advance by the corporation to the bank is that the bank shall aid by its loan an industry necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. Such advances can be made for periods not exceeding five years.

Second, the corporation is authorized to make advances for periods not exceeding one year "to any savings bank, banking institution, or trust company in the United States which receives savings deposits, or to any building and loan association in the United States * * * whenever the corporation shall deem such advances to be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war or important in the public interest."

It will be noticed that the recipient of such advances need not be a war industry; that is, an industry necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, or need not make loans to war industries. If the corporation deems advances to such savings banks, banking institutions, or trust companies, or building and loan associations "important in the public interest," such institutions are eligible to apply for advances. But the note of such savings banks, banking institutions, trust companies, and building and loan associations given for such advances will have to be secured by the pledge of securities the market value of which is equal at least to 133 per cent of the amount of the advance.

These institutions are in a way, however, contributing to the war, because their depositors are withdrawing deposits and buying liberty bonds. They are advancing the Government funds on its certificates of indebtedness.

All of these institutions are injuriously affected by Government issue of bonds and certificates of indebtedness alike. Building and loan associations are affected to some extent like savings banks.

The Government in its continuous issue and sale of bonds, with a rate of interest as high as any saving deposits receive, and in many States much higher, naturally induces depositors to draw out their money and invest in such bonds. The Government is therefore practically in competition with the savings banks. Hundreds of millions have already been drawn out for this purpose, and such withdrawals will continue as long as the Government is forced to sell bonds.

Deposits in savings banks are made with the view of their remaining for months and years. The deposit savings institutions therefore make long-time loans and investments, which the commercial banks do not. Large and unforeseen withdrawals by depositors for investment in bonds are likely to embarrass if not ruin some of the best and safest of these institutions if the corporation is not permitted to come to their rescue to some extent. As I said a moment ago, building and loan associations will be affected somewhat similar to the savings banks.

When my friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] suggested to the committee that building and loan associations should be included in this class I believe I was the first one who objected, and asked why should building and loan associations be included. I observed that they were lending money out, and the fellow who was building and had built a house was not putting money in it, he was getting or had gotten money out of it—he was a borrower. But the gentleman from Ohio reminded me that the association would not get along very well if all the members were borrowers; that a majority of the members were not borrowers; and that if the association did not have a greater number of nonborrowers, who put their money in to help the other fellow to build his home, they could have no borrowers and build no homes. He explained how millions of dollars have been and will continue to be withdrawn by the nonborrowing member to be put into liberty bonds.

That jogged my memory of exactly what I did. In the case of the second liberty loan I did not have the cash on hand, and I had been such a good friend of the banks in my community as a borrower that I owed them the limit. So to buy a few thousand dollars of liberty bonds I had to cash in my building and loan stock. Thousands of others, perhaps, did and will do as I did. The committee adopted the suggestion and amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], and, in my opinion, it was the fair thing to do.

I would say that one of the important differences between this bill and the original bill and the Senate bill is that we safeguard advances by the corporation by increasing the interest rate and the amount of security to be pledged. The bill requires the savings institutions and building and loan associations to pay a rate of interest on such advances at least 1 per cent per annum higher than is paid on commercial paper in the Federal reserve district in which the borrowing institution is located. That will have a tendency to bring the money back to the corporation as soon as possible. With such advances they are not supposed to make profits, and they do not become responsible for war-industries loans as do the commercial banks. The advances are made to them for their benefit to help them—to save them in some cases, perhaps—and not advanced to them to make loans to war industries for the prosecution of the war. We require them, therefore, to pay this 1 per cent per annum higher rate just as we do the persons, firms, or corporations that borrow direct from the corporation in aid of their war-contributing industries. The savings deposit institutions and building and loan associations must secure their notes by securities worth at least 133 per cent of the advances.

Third, this is the class of loans or advances to be made to war industries direct by the corporation, without the intervention of the banks. The corporation is authorized—in exceptional cases to make advances directly to any person, firm, corporation, or association, conducting an established and going business in the United States, whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war (but only for the purpose of conducting such business in the United States and only when such person, firm, corporation, or association is unable to obtain funds through banking channels or from the general public), for periods not exceeding five years.

It will be observed that the advances can only be made on condition that the borrowing person or concern is operating in the United States, that its operation is necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and that it has been unable to get loans through banking channels or the general public. But the total amount of loans or advances that can be outstanding at any one time under this direct loan provision is 16⅔ per cent, or one-sixth of the capital stock paid in at the time of the advance, plus the amount of bonds which the corporation is then authorized to issue and those outstanding. For instance, say, $200,000,000 of the capital stock has been paid in; it can then issue four times that much in bonds. It will then have $200,000,000 capital paid in and an authorization to issued $800,000,000 in bonds, or a total of $1,000,000,000. Under the direct loan provision, it would be only authorized to loan and have out at any one time in the aggregate 16⅔ per cent, or one-sixth of the $1,000,000,000. The original bill contained no limitation in this respect. I believe my friend from California [Mr. HAYES], who opposes this bill, will admit this provision is a great improvement over the original bill, or the bill the Senate passed.

Mr. HAYES. I admit that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, we have another limitation on this provision. This is an emergency measure, and I believe this limit which the committee put in will appeal to the sound business judgment of every man in or outside of this Congress. We provide that the rate of interest which this corporation shall charge when making advances direct under this clause or section must be at least 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount or interest on 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the Federal reserve bank in the district in which the borrower is located. Now, that will have a tendency to keep the borrowing industries within the banking channels and will also operate something like the graduated interest of the Vreeland-Aldrich Act to cause them to pay their obligations to the corporation as early as possible. There is another limitation put in this provision that I think you will admit is a great deal wiser and better, and certainly more secure, than the original bill. The original bill had no specific security. The board could take any amount of security it wanted, whether 20 per cent, 25 per cent, or 50 per cent. This bill requires that for each of these direct loans by the corporation the borrowing institution shall put up securities worth 133 per cent of the amount of the loan.

Another very important change——

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would rather get through first.

Mr. MEEKER. Just a question right there at that point.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me get through. The gentleman can save that question. I would like to answer the question, but I will get through in 15 minutes.

We provide in this bill what we believe is an important safeguard to the Federal Reserve System. We prevent, while the original bill authorizes, the Federal reserve banks buying and investing or dealing in the bonds of the corporation. In my opinion the provision in the original bill which permitted the Federal reserve banks to go out and purchase and deal in these bonds, if it should become law, would impair to a considerable extent the strength and virtue of the entire Federal Reserve System. I understand that the Committee on Banking and Currency as a unit agrees with us on that proposition.

We further safeguard the Federal Reserve System by requiring that in the case of discounts of the direct obligations of member banks and rediscount of eligible paper secured by bonds of the corporation that the interest charge shall be not less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the interest rate on eligible commercial paper of corresponding maturity. That is to prevent the reserve banks from loading up with so much paper secured by the long-time bonds of the corporation. While the bonds run from one to five years, we require the note of the member bank to be paid, if it is a direct loan, in 15 days; and if it is rediscount paper it must be paid in 90 days.

In other words, the member bank rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank eligible paper secured by the corporation bonds must make it payable in 90 days. If it is a direct note of the bank secured by such bond, it must be payable in 15 days. Such notes can be renewed from time to time, but within 90 days, which is the outside limit, the Federal reserve bank can protect itself by calling upon the member bank to pay. The member bank can go out and sell the corporation bonds if necessary to meet its payment.

Another requirement that was not in the bill as it passed the Senate, or in the original bill, is that before the member bank can get any money from the Federal reserve bank for its paper secured by these bonds it must satisfy the Federal reserve bank that it has not in its possession sufficient commercial paper eligible for discount or rediscount under the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made under authority of the Federal reserve act. In our opinion, it is best to separate as far as practicable the influence of the corporation over the Federal Reserve System and the Federal reserve banks. It is almost certain—and it is wise that it should be so—that some members of the Federal Reserve Board are going to be members of this directorate; and if we do not hedge it about and safeguard the Federal Reserve System by these limitations, the members of the Federal Reserve Board who will be members of this may fall too much in love with their new companion, overlooking the primary purpose and functions of the Federal Reserve System, and may unwittingly subject the system too much to the interests of the corporation.

The bill as it came to us had no penalties attaching to a director or other officer who violated the law, who embezzled, misappropriated funds, and so forth, and had no penalties for making false entries, and no penalties for the certifying to or making false statements or overvaluations by anyone for the purpose of securing advances. We have penalties, both fines and imprisonment, for such offenses. Another important limitation, in neither the original nor the Senate bill, which we provide is that the corporation can not advance and have outstanding at any one time to any one person, firm, corporation, or association an amount in excess of 10 per cent of its—the finance corporation's—capital stock. This is similar to the national-bank-act requirements. Before concluding my explanations of this title, let me say that we have thrown another safeguard around the direct advances by the corporation by requiring a quarterly report to the House and Senate, detailing the amount advanced, the names and addresses of the recipients of the advances, the time, and the security accepted.

Title II. Capital Issues Committee.—By this title a committee, called the Capital Issues Committee, is created, separate and distinct from the War Finance Corporation. This is another difference between this and the original bill.

Mr. FESS. Before the gentleman leaves the first title, will he submit to one question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish the gentleman would just keep that in his mind. I am going to get through with this in about 5 minutes, and then for 20 minutes I will be glad to answer questions.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is leaving the first title.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know, but I want to get through with both, and then return and answer questions.

The original bill gave the directors of the War Finance Corporation the absolute power to grant or refuse a license for the issue or sale or offering for sale or subscription of any issue of securities by any individual, firm, corporation, or association, if the total aggregate issue was in excess of $100,000. In other words, an industrial corporation, if its aggregate issue was in excess of $100,000, could not put any of its securities on the market for sale; and if any person should buy them, neither could he resell or put them upon the market for sale without first getting a license from this corporation, under penalty of fine and imprisonment. This title of the bill which we present to the House—and it is practically the same as the provision of the Senate bill as it finally passed the Senate—takes from the corporation any power or authority over the issuing of securities, and creates a Capital Issues Committee, to consist of seven members, not more than four of whom shall be of the same political party, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This Capital Issues Committee has no power to grant or refuse licenses for the issuing of securities or the offering for sale of securities. The only power the Capital Issues Committee has, which for all practical, legitimate purposes is almost as effective as the mandatory provisions of the original bill, is this: When securities are issued or offered for sale, if the aggregate of the issues is in excess of $100,000, its only power is "to investigate, pass upon, and determine" whether or not the issue and sale or offer for sale or subscription of such securities is compatible with the public interest. I think, gentlemen, that should be the "national interest" instead of the "public interest," and your committee will, at the proper time, propose an amendment accordingly.

For instance, suppose a corporation or firm of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] wanted to issue a million dollars of securities and offer them for sale. It would submit them to this committee with all the facts with respect to the purpose and use to be made of them or their proceeds and the necessity of the issue. The committee would make investigation, and it would determine, not whether the issue or sale should be made, but whether the issuing or offering them for sale was compatible with the national interest. If they decide that it is not compatible with the national interest, they will not put any mark on these securities. If they decide that it is compatible, I imagine that their plan will be to approve their issue and sale as compatible with the national interest and permit the corporation or company to publish and, if it is desired, to print on the securities such approval. It will have almost the same effect as if the committee was empowered to grant or refuse a license. If they should decide that the issue or sale of such securities was not compatible with the national interest, they would simply declare that their issue or sale was not compatible with the national interest, and the power of the committee, so far as such securities are concerned, would be at an end.

The corporation or company could proceed to issue and sell its securities, if it could get a purchaser, without violating any law or incurring any penalty. The matter would be left to the patriotism and judgment of the company and to the patriotism and judgment of the purchasers. However, it would be most difficult to put on the market or sell privately, especially to security dealers, securities, the issue and sale of which had been condemned by this committee as incompatible with the national interest.

Just a moment in reference to the qualifications of the members of this committee. Like the membership of the board of directors of the War Finance Corporation, it is no bar to appointment that one is already an officer of the Government. The bill requires that at least three members of the Capital Issues Committee shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board. That provision was put in because there is at present, and has been for a month or more, in the Treasury Department a volunteer capital issues committee, and three members of the Federal Reserve Board are members of such committee and are fairly acquainted with the work to be done by and the duties of the Capital Issues Committee created by this bill. They have all the machinery and are organized in the same way that this committee will be organized. It was the thought of the committee and of the Senate, according to the bill it passed, and also of the Treasury Department, that these three members should be retained as members of this new Capital Issues Committee.

The salary, if the members are not members of the Federal Reserve Board, is fixed at $7,500, but if a member receives any other compensation from any office or employment under the United States, the amount so received is to be deducted from his salary. If a member receives more than $7,500 in some other capacity as an officer or employee of the Government, he should receive no salary as a member of the committee.

Title III. Miscellaneous.—This title contains penalties for violations of the provisions of the act not provided for in section 18. It contains also a provision to the effect that no stamp tax shall be required on any note secured by a pledge of liberty bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the Government, provided the par value of such Government obligations equals the amount of such note.

I believe that that provision will meet with universal approval in the House and in the country.

There is another provision in this title of much importance. You see it in the papers, you heard it discussed in the Senate, and it has been discussed here—as to whether or not the corporation bonds, the two billions provided in the House bill and the four billions provided in the Senate bill, would be a moral obligation on the part of the Government, and whether or not the Government should not guarantee such bonds. Some have taken the position that the United States should be bound to stand behind every one of these bonds, though not expressly guaranteeing them. Others take the position that if the United States Government is morally behind these bonds to be issued by the corporation it ought to expressly by this act guarantee their payment. If the United States is to guarantee their payment, it might as well issue its own bonds and lend the money to the war industries. So that there might be no question about it, so that a person would know that he was getting corporation bonds and not Government bonds, so that everyone would know that the United States was and should be in no way liable, implied or expressed, we added a section to the bill, which specifically provides:

That the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation.

But I believe these bonds are going to be practically as good as the Government bonds. Of course, a great deal will depend upon the board of directors. If they are strong, courageous, honest business men, with good judgment—and I am confident it will be that class of men—these bonds will be practically as safe and as good as Government bonds; that is, if the House bill passes.

Every safeguard is thrown around them. The Government, of course, could possibly stand to lose $500,000,000, which is its capital stock, or whatever part of it is paid in. That amount will be back of these bonds. We so provide. But when you come to think about these war industries, they are, in practically every case, corporations or companies of large assets, owned and controlled by business men of large affairs and big wealth. I sometimes fear that such fellows will get too much of the corporation advances and the smaller fellows too little. Behind every advance made and every bond issued, so far as five-sixths of the business is concerned, which will go through the banks, are the notes of the borrowing companies or corporations and all the securities which the lending banks require of them, and in addition, the notes of the banks and such other securities as the finance corporation may require to make absolutely safe its advances to the banks. The bonds have a floating lien not only upon all these assets but upon the capital stock paid in by the Government. As to the direct loans by the corporation under section 9 they are limited in amount, as I have before explained, to sixteen and two-thirds of the capital paid in plus the aggregate amount of bonds authorized to be issued and outstanding at the time of the advance, which, if the full amount of capital is paid in and the full amount of bonds authorized by the bill is issued, can not exceed $416,666,666. Such direct advances must have behind them securities worth 133 per cent of their amount. The Government's $500,000,000 capital stock is an additional asset to which the floating lien attaches. It seems, therefore, that in every business view the corporation's bonds will be absolutely good and safe and amply secured.

As to the direct advances by the corporation, we have thrown another check or safeguard around them, to which I briefly alluded a few moments ago. We have a provision in the bill, not in the original bill, that all of the advances made by this corporation, direct to any person, firm, association, or corporation, must be reported to the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate by the corporation every three months. In that report it must give the name and the address and the amount of the advance, the nature of the securities, and the terms of the loan made to each individual, firm, or corporation. My own committee differs with me in respect to this provision, and I hope now that it may be persuaded to modify that. I strongly favor and urge now, as I have urged, that the corporation should be made to report quarterly; but I think it ought to be modified in this way: The report should inform Congress and the people each quarter the amount outstanding at the time of the report, and outstanding on the first day of each month, up to the time of the report, how many bonds it had issued and were outstanding them, and how many were outstanding on the first of each month prior to the report, and the nature and amount of the securities taken for the advances, and the average lengths of time for which the loans were made. I would require such reports as to each class of loans or advances. I think it is unwise, as the provision now stands, to require the name of the company, corporation, or individual, and the amount and terms of the advances made to such company, corporation, or individual, and the securities given. If we do, we will give one competitor a great advantage over another. Take two concerns that are competing, making and selling to the Government and the allies the same article. One, we will say, is able to get his money through the banks. No report is made. Neither his competitor nor anyone knows the amount, nature, or terms of his loan or securities given. The other has the banks combined against him, as has frequently occurred in cases of large competition, or without such combination is unable to get funds from the banks.

But he is producing necessary munitions or other articles for the war. It is to the interest of the Government that it continue business and that there be competition in the production of these articles; he must come to the War Finance Corporation for aid. The corporation under the present provision must make a quarterly report and give the name of that particular concern, and the amount of money borrowed, the terms of the loan, and the securities that it had to put up, and every detail of the transaction. All can readily see what a great advantage such a report would give its competitor. It would also have the effect of impairing or destroying the credit of the borrower.

I think I am through with the explanation of the bill, and will now be glad to answer any questions of gentlemen.

Mr. MEEKER. In section 10, when you are discussing the amount that shall not exceed 10 per cent of the capital stock that shall go to any corporation, does that include subsidiary organizations?

Mr. KITCHIN. This corporation has $500,000,000 capital. It never can make a loan to any one concern to exceed 10 per cent of that. I think the spirit and intent of this section is that in case of a corporation owning a majority of the stock or controlling interest in another corporation, the two would be regarded as one concern.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will permit, under section 7 the provision is made for empowering advances to different banking corporations or concerns doing a commercial business. Under section 8 it empowers advances to certain financial corporations, including savings banks. Of course, there is a difference made between two kinds of business, commercial and saving. Now, under section 8, empowering the corporation to loan to savings banks, there is a limitation made upon the rate of interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But there is none under section 7 making loans to banking institutions or commercial business. What is the difference made between the two? Under section 7, relating to commercial banks, there is no provision made in regard to the interest rate, but under section 8, relative to savings banks, there is.

Mr. KITCHIN. In section 7 advances are made to the banking institutions, which make the loans to industries whose operations are necessary or contributory to the war. The banks thus assume, with such industries, the payment to the corporation of its advances. They would not take the risk of assuming liability and the trouble and expense of handling such loans if it had to pay the extra 1 per cent. The purpose of the advances to the banks under section 7 is not to help the banks, not for their benefit, but to aid and benefit the war industries and at the same time give to the corporations' advances the banks' obligations as additional security for their payment.

But the advances by the corporation to the savings banks are for the direct benefit of such banks, to help them, just as in the case of advances made under section 9 by the corporation to the war industries, to help them. Under section 9 such direct advances bear the same extra 1 per cent as do the savings banks. The savings banks are not required, as a condition precedent, in order to secure advances, that it shall use them for the purpose of loaning to or aiding an industry necessary or contributory to the war. It is not called upon to assume liability for loans for the benefit of others, as in the case of banks under section 8.

Mr. FESS. What change, if any, in the original bill did the committee make in reference to the issuance of Federal reserve notes and exchange for these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will understand that the bill does not authorize issuing Federal reserve notes in exchange for the bonds of the corporation; but such notes can be issued on paper eligible for discount or rediscount, secured by such bonds, with the same maturities as is provided under regulations of the Federal Reserve Board under the reserve act.

The rate of interest which a member bank must pay in discounting or rediscounting paper with the Federal reserve bank, secured by such bonds, is not less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the prevailing rate at such Federal reserve bank.

Mr. FESS. That is a matter of precaution?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is a matter of precaution and protection to the reserve system.

Mr. FESS. What I wanted to know specifically was whether the circulation per capita under this organization will be increased, and to what extent?

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean the real currency?

Mr. FESS. Yes; the real currency.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think there will be very little currency issued on paper secured by these bonds. In this connection

I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, what is the difference between a Federal reserve bank note and a Federal reserve note? Is it that the Federal reserve bank note must be secured by a Government bond?

Mr. GLASS. The Federal reserve bank note is issued in pursuance of that bank's ownership of United States bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. And it must have that behind it?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the Federal reserve note is only required to have 40 per cent gold reserve behind it in addition to the commercial paper back of the note of the member bank as collateral.

Mr. FESS. That is what I am trying to get at, whether the Federal reserve bank, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, can receive these corporation bonds and issue any amount of Federal reserve notes?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; but if it had the power, it would hardly do that with the extra 1 per cent per annum interest provision. I think under provisions of this bill the Federal reserve bank, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, can have issued notes by putting up its note or eligible paper, secured by the bonds of the corporation, just as it could do with the liberty bonds. Whatever you can do with a liberty bond you can do with this bond with respect to Federal reserve bank notes or Federal reserve notes.

Mr. FESS. That is one of the things that is fundamental in this?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. There is another question I want to ask——

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, in one case the Government is behind it and in the other case the Government is not liable?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; as to the respective bonds; but as to the bank reserve notes, of course the Federal reserve bank will be behind it and the member bank will be behind it, and other securities will be behind it, and the corporation bond will be behind such Federal reserve bank notes.

Mr. FESS. What authority is given to this corporation to use its money for the purchase of liberty bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not quite catch that.

Mr. FESS. Is the authority in the bill given to the corporation to purchase liberty bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it can purchase any bonds issued or converted by the Government since September 24, 1917, the date the last bond act became a law.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the opinion of the chairman——

Mr. KITCHIN. It is the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Treasury Department, as I understand, that this provision will have a stabilizing influence on the market value of liberty bonds.

Mr. FESS. Now, in view of the fact that the chairman has made a very lucid and comprehensive statement of the bill, I should like to have his opinion on what amount of inflation, if any, this bill will have the effect of producing upon the currency?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, that is hard to say. It would depend largely upon the administration of the act by the directors, and also it would depend largely, so far as the inflation of the actual currency is concerned, on the Federal Reserve Board. They need not issue a dollar of new currency on the basis of the corporation bonds. There is no right given to a member bank which holds these bonds to go and demand it as a matter of right. I think the Federal Reserve Board has got its eye on that proposition, and the same thought is running through the minds of a majority of the board as is running in the gentleman's mind and through mine. I do not anticipate much inflation of the actual currency. There will be an expansion of credit. There must be, because we have not money enough, if we had all the actual money in the world, to carry on the transactions that the Government must carry on during this war.

Mr. CALDWELL. I was going to ask the gentleman if there was a provision in the bill to prohibit the directors of the corporation from loaning the corporate money to concerns in which they are interested?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. Personally, I think there should be in this case and in every case of boards and commissions and agencies dealing with or advising on the expenditures of Government funds. But we put in this provision—not in the original bill—that no director or officer of this corporation can, directly or indirectly, participate in any loan to any partnership or firm or corporation or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested. If he does do that he is guilty of an offense punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

Mr. CALDWELL. I did not see it in the original bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. You understand the Finance Corporation through its directors can make advances to a firm or corporation in which a director is interested, provided such interested director does not, directly or indirectly, participate in the loan.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is the same as in the case of a bank. The bank can not loan to itself. You have not a provision like that. Do you not think it is wise?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the principle of the gentleman's suggestion should have been incorporated in several other bills that have become law, but the House and Senate did not seem to think so, and the advisers of the administration did not think so, taking the position that such a provision would be a great obstacle to the most efficient administration of the War and Navy Departments during the war. Under the provision in question not only is the interested director forbidden to vote upon the question of making the loan, but he is not even permitted quietly to suggest that his firm or corporation is worthy of the loan or to express a hope to the board that the loan will be made, and so forth. He can not participate in any proceedings in any way with respect to the loan, "directly or indirectly."

Mr. CALDWELL. If it so happens that the directors are heads of a number of institutions, three might sit down and loan $50,000,000 to the one, and the other three might sit down and loan $50,000,000 to the other, and so on; but of course the President would not be expected to appoint that class of men—$50,000,000 is a lot of money.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose the President did appoint that class of men, which, of course, he would not. I imagine that if the prosecuting attorney had one-half the legal ability and astuteness that the gentleman has, he could convict them all for collusion in participating in such a transaction.

Mr. GARNER. Also, the President can remove them at any time.

Mr. KITCHIN. The President can remove them at any time. That is one of the provisions of the bill to which I have failed to call attention. The President can at any time remove any of the directors of this corporation, or members of the Capital Issues Committee, or any officer.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MCFADDEN) has been on his feet for some time, and I yield to him.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I want to ask the chairman of the committee two or three questions.

Mr. KITCHIN. Can not the gentleman put all his questions in one, because I am going to stop in a few minutes, when my time will be up?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Following the question of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. FESS) a little further in regard to the issuance of Federal reserve notes, is the gentleman of the opinion that the deposit by member banks of notes secured by these corporation securities with any one of the 12 reserve banks would be legal reserves?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think so. Let me ask the gentleman there: In your opinion, can or can not the Federal reserve bank take a note of a member bank secured by liberty bonds, not bearing the circulation privilege—and none of them do bear it—and issue Federal reserve notes on them? I do not refer to Federal reserve bank notes, but Federal reserve notes.

Mr. MCFADDEN. No privilege is granted that is not given to United States bonds in this respect, but I am not speaking of the notes, but of legal reserve.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am asking for your opinion and information now.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I was speaking particularly of a member bank taking a note from a corporation. The member bank takes that note and deposits it in the Federal reserve bank of its district and receives credit for it. Is there any difference between that credit and the deposit of gold? The bank gets credit on which it can grant loans.

Mr. KITCHIN. As a bank credit against which checks can be drawn? No. But such a note is supposed to be paid in gold or money when due, otherwise the bank would not give the credit against it. I do not know as much about the Federal Reserve System as I ought. I do not know half as much about it as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] does, for he is a member of the Banking and Currency Committee and has given great detailed study to it; but my understanding of the way the Federal reserve notes are issued is that they are issued to a Federal reserve bank. The reserve bank must put up the notes and eligible paper as security, and also there must be behind them 40 per cent in gold before any Federal reserve note can be issued.

Mr. MCFADDEN. That is true.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, if the amount of a Federal reserve note is to be $100, there must be put up $40 in gold as a reserve against it. And the bank that is going to get these reserve notes must put up its note and back it with eligible paper. That is as I understand the way the Federal reserve notes are issued, and the Federal reserve bank notes are issued on deposit of Government bonds as collateral to the bank note.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is true.

Mr. KITCHIN. If that is so, I think I can answer all of the gentleman's questions in one. If that be true, I do not think under this bill any man need be alarmed at all about the issuing of Federal reserve notes to the extent of unreasonable inflation.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is true so far as the actual issuance of Federal reserve notes is concerned.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought that was what the gentleman was getting at.

Mr. McFADDEN. But a member bank deposits a customer's note, secured by these War Finance Corporation securities, with the Federal reserve bank, and receives credit——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. The member bank, of course, can destroy itself if it wants to. The Federal reserve bank, perhaps, can destroy itself if it wants to, and the Federal Reserve Board can destroy the system if it wants to, but no new money or Federal reserve notes can get out anywhere until the Federal Reserve Board orders it. It passes on the security. The Federal reserve bank passes on the security. The member bank that makes the first loan on the security passes on it. The Federal Reserve Board finally must pass upon the wisdom and necessity of further note issues. I do not see how we are in much danger of getting unreasonable inflation——

Mr. McFADDEN. In this way, that the member bank——

Mr. KITCHIN. You are going to have an expansion of credit, of course.

Mr. McFADDEN. The Federal reserve member banks under the law are required to keep a 7 per cent reserve on deposits. In other words, with a $7,000 balance at the Federal reserve bank it can loan $100,000, or increase its deposits to that extent. The deposit of the note of the member bank at the Federal reserve bank is just the same as if they deposited money or gold. There is no difference between this kind of credit and the kind of credit established by the deposit of gold.

Mr. KITCHIN. If a man has the security which is supposed to get the money or gold when due to continue the credit; yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The danger of inflation is not with the issuance of Federal reserve notes, but through the inflation of credit, which is the same thing.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought the gentleman was heretofore referring to inflations by issue of Federal reserve notes, because I know that was in my mind when I first studied the bill, and it was in the gentleman's mind first, because we discussed it.

Mr. McFADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman one other question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman said, during his very fair statement of the bill, that he could not imagine anyone would advocate the loaning of this money on the part of the Government direct to banks and industrial institutions. That is, if they did, it would require the immediate sale of $4,000,000,000 worth of Liberty bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said I did not believe any man would advocate or favor the Government coming to the rescue of the war industries direct from the Treasury, and that sooner or later it would require, if you are going to lend $4,000,000,000, as provided in the original bill, issuing bonds to that amount or greatly increasing taxation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then the gentleman admits that $4,000,000,000 is to be raised from this source by the creation of this law?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I said that under the original bill $4,000,000,000 in bonds would be issued, but that we had limited it to $2,000,000,000, and if the Government had to do it directly the Government would have to issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds or raise that much additional by taxation. It may later on develop that it will take $4,000,000,000, but the thought of the committee was that it ought to cut to $2,000,000,000; that we should wait and see how this bill is going to operate; that if Congress is satisfied with the operation and conduct of the business and it later is shown that the $4,000,000,000 is required, Congress could then make the authorization. The Treasury Department is anxious, and says it is nesessary, to increase this limit to $4,000,000,000. Your committee said to it that when the corporation issues bonds up to $1,000,000,000 or $1,500,000,000, and from the reports sent to Congress and upon investigation Congress is satisfied that the business of the corporation has been managed wisely and in accordance with the act, there will be no trouble in getting the authority to issue more of these bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will recall that Mr. Warburg, while he said that it would be advisable to have the limit placed at $4,000,000,000, said that he did not expect anything like that would ever be issued.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is true.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman said that a large percentage of the advances would come from the banks—national banks, State banks, and trust companies?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is, the banks will handle, or are expected to handle, most of the loans to the war industries and receive most of the advances from the corporation. The authors of the bill, the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Warburg, who appeared before our committee, said that the primary object was to require practically all of the business of the corporation to go through the banking channels, and that in exceptional cases only would advances be made direct by the corporation.

Mr. McFADDEN. That being the case, is not the burden still on the banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; in the sense I have just explained.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then, why create an institution of this kind?

Mr. KITCHIN. The burden is not on the banks in that sense. The gentleman's proposition is to burden the Federal Reserve System with the whole burden of the powers and responsibilities and duties contained in this bill. The benefits or burdens, if any, of this bill apply to State banks, savings banks, trust companies, and all kinds of banking institutions.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will not the sale of these bonds come into competition with the sale of liberty bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think so, to some extent. I regard that as one of the dangers in the operation of this bill. I am afraid that they will compete with the Government bonds to a larger extent than does the Secretary of the Treasury. He said that there might be some danger. This matter necessarily must be left to the good judgment and the wisdom of the directorate and the Secretary, who is chairman of the board of directors. I feel confident they will arrange it so that they will not measurably handicap the sale of Government bonds.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest that the rate of interest must be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and properly so.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that recently the Farm Loan Board were unable to sell their securities and had to come to the United States Treasury for help.

Mr. GLASS. If the gentleman from North Carolina will yield, that statement needs to be modified somewhat; they thought that they could not sell them, but, as a matter of fact, they have not yet come to the United States Treasury for help.

Mr. MADDEN. But they have got the authority.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the chairman if the theory of the bill is that this corporation is to be self-sustaining?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and there may be a little profit in it. We provide that its net earnings may be liquidated and put into Government bonds, and so forth.

Mr. DENISON. How about the salaries, and so forth? Are they to be paid by the corporation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but the salaries of the Capital Issues Committee, which is entirely separate from the corporation under our bill, will be paid by the Government.

Mr. DENISON. Is there any provision in the bill about the limits of this corporation?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad the gentleman has asked about that. I may have overlooked that in my explanation of the details of the bill. The life of the corporation is 10 years, but it can not do any business, except winding up its affairs and liquidating its assets, after six months after the termination of the war, the time of such termination to be proclaimed by the President. In other words, it can make no more loans, issue no more bonds, after six months following the termination of the war. The directors must then begin to wind up its business, liquidate its assets, and turn any net earnings or surplus over to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the war corporation is authorized to last for 10 years.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Their functions are confined to the period of the war and six months thereafter, except as to the liquidation of assets?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. In the consideration of the bill did the chairman discover any sentiment at all in favor of a permanent institution of this kind?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it is purely a war measure, and I am sure no member of our committee would vote for the bill except as a necessary war measure.

Mr. CANNON. Are the obligations of this corporation which is about to be organized subject to taxation, State or Federal?

Mr. KITCHIN. They are subject to the taxation that the liberty bonds issued under the act of September 24, 1917, are subject to—that is, estate tax, surtaxes, and excess-profits taxes, with the same exemption with respect to the $5,000 which the gentleman had put into the last liberty bond act.

Mr. CANNON. That answers the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not that one of the reasons why it is expected that these bonds will sell?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is one of the inducements for a person to buy.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. What kind of exceptional cases did the committee have in mind when it framed section 9?

Mr. KITCHIN. War industries which in many cases included public-utilities companies and power plants when they show that they can not get the money through the banks or general public.

Mr. KNUTSON. If they can not get the money through the banks, they are questionable loans, are they not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; not necessarily so. They may be most solvent and worthy of credit, but the banks, with such demand upon them by the Government to buy certificates of indebtedness and to furnish money to customers to buy liberty bonds, may not have the necessary funds.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why should they not be compelled to furnish just as much security as those who make their loans through the banks?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They have to furnish more.

Mr. KITCHIN. They have to furnish equally as much securities—securities equal to 133 per cent—if the loan must be given. I think the gentleman is looking at the original bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. That overcomes, then, the objection that I had.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understood the gentleman to say that this bill contemplated taking care of all banks alike—that is, Federal, State, and private banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not taking care of all the banks, but to make advances to banks, whether State or national, when they make loans to industries contributing to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to what is now happening. A prominent banker states that he has a communication from the auditor of the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation to the effect that they will discontinue carrying a certain trustee account unless the bank becomes a member of the Federal Reserve System. This is a large State bank handling money on account of shipbuilding.

Mr. KITCHIN. I appreciate what the gentleman says. If that State bank is sound and safe and perfectly worthy of the deposit, I think the auditor referred to ought to be rebuked for trying to coerce by such a method or threat this bank into the reserve system.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the bank says it can not go into the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. This corporation under this bill makes absolutely no distinction between State banks and banks that are members of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And it would rise above the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman was asked a question by some one here as to whether or not this law would interfere with the sale of liberty bonds, and I think he answered that that might possibly be true.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. It has been my understanding that one of the purposes of this law is to control credits in order that the Government may be assured that it can sell its bonds without selling them at a high rate of interest.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is right. That is one of the primary objects to be accomplished by the Capital Issue Committee title of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Section 9 of the bill provides for the direct loans?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. What I want to ask the gentleman is this: Is the language used in this and other sections touching those eligible for advances, or the character of advances possible under the bill, intended to exclude a going agricultural enterprise?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not all. I can conceive of an established agricultrual industry that is necessary and contributory to the war, and it would be amenable to the provisions of this bill. That is, it would come within the provisions that make it eligible to apply for loans from the corporation or from the banks.

Mr. ANDERSON. It struck me so under the language, and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. DOWELL. Would that apply to the individual?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the individual would come under the provisions if he was engaged in an industry necessary or contributory to the war, and we can all conceive of many kinds of agricultural industries necessary or contributory to the war, but generally one engaged in agriculture can get the necessary funds from his local banks. I think, too, a reclamation or an irrigation association that could show that it was necessary and contributory to the prosecution of the war, and that it could not get the necessary funds elsewhere, and could put up the proper security and comply with the other terms, would be just as eligible to apply for that loan as the Du Pont Powder Co.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentlemen will look on pages 69 and 70 of the hearings, they will find that the Secretary of the Treasury answered that question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought that the Secretary of the Treasury answered it.

Mr. REED. Liberty bonds are quoted now, or have been quoted, below par?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. And the idea of this is that this bill will stabilize them?

Mr. KITCHIN. The provision whereby the corporation can purchase such bonds will have a tendency to stabilize them.

Mr. REED. That never contemplates the original purchase or new issues, but those just thrown on the market?

Mr. KITCHIN. But the corporation would have the right to subscribe for original issue of bonds. However, it will deal, for the most part if not all, as the gentleman suggests. As to bonds being below par, there are just a few millions that have been offered for sale—just a limited few, not anything like $100,000,000 worth—and, of course, they are quoted. But I have never seen a person yet that had a bond that would take less than par for it. I have asked several parties if they were ready to sell their bonds at less than par; they replied that they were not. I have never found anyone willing to do it, and I doubt if this quoted market value of the bonds is really a bona fide market value.

Mr. REED. They place them with the broker and get bids at these prices?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think the gentleman did not understand the question asked by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED]. As I understood him, he asked the question whether or not this corporation could buy Government bonds when they were originally issued or whether they were confined to bonds of later issue.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it could subscribe for bonds as originally issued.

Mr. MONDELL. During his illuminating discussion of the bill the gentleman called attention to the importance of the personnel of the organizations which the bill provides. He emphasized the importance of the personnel being of a character to command the respect and the good judgment of the country, and his committee has very wisely provided that not over three of the members of the corporation and four of the members of the committee should be of one political party.

I wanted to know how the committee views that provision. Was that viewed by the committee as merely a matter of persiflage and verbal camouflage, or is it considered a real provision in the bill which the committee hopes and expects will be carried out in good faith and honestly, so that the business and the corporation will really represent the views of the country economically and politically?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, after the manner of answering questions in the House of Commons, I will say to the latter part of the gentleman's question, I answer in the affirmative. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Then the gentleman is more hopeful of the future in this particular respect than he has reason to be gratified at the experience of the past?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman take the commissions and boards that have been appointed under Taft's administration or the Wilson administration, where it was intended by the law they should be nonpartisan, and it was specified in the act that not more than so many of a political party should be appointed, he will find that such requirements have been carried out very fairly under both administrations.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will accept an amendment striking out the administration which he last referred to, I will vote for his proposition. But the gentleman does believe——

Mr. KITCHIN. Your suggestion is out of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does believe, personally, that it is important that a bill of this kind should be carried out in good faith?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do. Take the Federal Trade Commission and the Federal Reserve Board, appointed by Mr. Wilson, and if I wanted to bet—and I never did bet, for if I did, I would lose [laughter]—here is one bet that I would win, that the majority on both of those commissions are of a party opposite to that of the administration.

Mr. MONDELL. On what information does the gentleman base that statement?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the objection to the Government being responsible for those bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. If it is going to be responsible, why not issue its own bonds?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are two reasons why the Government should. In the first place, they are competing with Government bonds, and, in the next place, it is for the benefit of the Government solely and entirely. And another thing——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that I think it would be unfortunate for the Government to do it, and I would not favor this proposition at all if the Government had to guarantee all these bonds. I should say, if the Government is to be responsible, it would be the wise thing for it to issue and sell its own bonds to finance direct the industries necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. Then there would be no competition in sale of bonds and no question as to them. All would be alike.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We are going out very soon to help sell these bonds, and these questions will be asked.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can just tell them that the bill itself declares specifically and expressly that the Government is not responsible for a penny of the principal or interest on these bonds or for any act of commission or omission of any of the directors or officers of this corporation. The Government has already put into it, or shall have put into it, $500,000,000 when the capital stock is fully paid in, as part of the assets as security to the bonds, and they are going to have all the securities of the banks and corporations and individuals to which loans are made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Denominated "commercial paper," and nobody thinks that what is denominated as commercial paper is as good as securities of their Government.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and I will then take my seat.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the Government loan to any subsidiary corporation? It says here in section 10—

> That in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this title to any one person, firm, corporation, or association exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation.

Now, if they loan up to 10 per cent of the capital stock of the corporation to the parent corporation, can they loan up to 10 per cent to a subsidiary corporation?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that according to the strict letter of that provision they could so loan, but not according to its spirit and intent, and no directorate would make such a loan under such circumstances to the subsidiary corporation; that is, a corporation the majority of whose stock or the controlling interest is owned by another corporation if to the parent company the 10 per cent had been advanced and was still outstanding. I say that the loan to the parent and such subsidiary together ought not to be over 10 per cent. I thank gentlemen for their patience and attention. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has explained so thoroughly the purposes of the bill that, so far as I am concerned, I am going to be very brief, if permitted, in explaining my views about this bill and its purposes.

It is an emergency measure and nothing else. That is all there is to it, and that is all there ought to be to it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asked Mr. Warburg when he was before our committee what he thought of this bill, and he said, "It is an emergency measure, and therefore I am in favor of it." I will quote his exact words. The gentleman from Texas then said to him, "Mr. Warburg, what would you think of this law in normal times?" His reply was, "It would be absolutely rotten, sir; absolutely rotten."

It is an emergency measure, because we are doing great things and taking great chances at this time throughout the whole world. It is for the purpose of making available certain securities as collateral to loans that are not available for that purpose to-day.

All will agree that the Federal reserve banks to-day have saved us from a financial panic. [Applause.] The Federal reserve banks under existing law can only loan on commercial paper—paper given in the payment or the promise of payment in a business transaction—for instance, in the purchase of goods or real estate or any other property. The local banks, the member banks of the Federal reserve bank, can rediscount such paper with the Federal reserve bank, and no other paper; that is to say, a direct loan made to an individual or corporation by a member bank; and that company's paper given the member bank can not rediscount with the Federal reserve bank.

I wish to repeat: Commercial paper alone can be rediscounted by the member banks in a Federal reserve bank, and therefore collateral security, such as is expected to be offered under the terms of this bill, is not available for rediscount for loans in the Federal reserve banks.

In normal times the annual products of the country, agricultural and manufactured, exceed in value $30,000,000,000. With inflated values, such as there are now all over this world, due to this great world war, our products, agricultural and manufactured, exceed in value this year more than $50,000,000,000. There is in round numbers in circulation in this country $6,000,000,000 in money of all kinds at the present time, and in June of this year more than half that sum will be called into the United States Treasury from taxes; and if you remove from the business channels of this country one-half of all the money of this country and pay it into the Treasury of the United States any business man can understand that there is going to be a scarcity of money in the country to be loaned to the industries of the country to carry on the production of goods, agricultural and manufactured.

My candid opinion is that the real purpose of this bill is to loan money to the great railroads of the country chiefly, and I will tell you why. There is an estimated valuation of railroad property in the United States to-day of $17,500,000,000. In my candid opinion their value is $20,000,000,000. Because of legislation, both State and National, that has been unfriendly to the railroads of the country for the past 10 or 15 years the railroad property of the country is not as valuable as heretofore. That is to say, investments in railroad property are not attractive, and railroad securities have gone clear out of sight on the toboggan slide.

Of the railroads of the country last year 750 railway systems in all borrowed but $57,000,000, or three-tenths of 1 per cent of their valuation, based upon $17,500,000,000. The money lenders of the country will not lend money to the railroads. Of course, while the railroads are under Government control, with the guaranty of a certain rate of income based on the value of the property while the Government is behind the railroads, railroad securities sell at better prices in the market than if the Government were not back of them. But if I were loaning money I would not loan to the railroads of the country. I would much rather accept municipal bonds at a reasonable rate of interest, because most of the municipal bonds of the country are exempt from taxation.

That is one reason why money lenders will invest in such securities. The second is they are the best class of loans in the country except real estate mortgages. They are more apt to be paid. But with 750 railway systems of this country last year, as I said before on the floor of this House, borrowing only $57,000,000, with the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing the maximum rates on freight and passenger fares the railroads can charge, and the Congress of the United States fixing the minimum wage scale—two great bodies, one fixing the income and the other fixing the outgo—railroad property is in a bad fix. And the condition is going to get more chaotic every day unless we have some more favorable legislation in the interest of the railroads. The railroads of this country are the bone and sinew of the industrial world——

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman notice in this morning's paper that the Interstate Commerce Commission had issued an order increasing the railroad freight rates 15 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. Fifteen per cent on what and where, my friend?

Mr. MADDEN. Railroad rates.

Mr. FORDNEY. There are three great railway divisions in the country, fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. One is west of the Mississippi River, another south of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River, and the third is north of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River. This increase in rates does not apply to all the railroads in the whole country.

Again let me say to the gentleman—I am diverting, however, from the purpose of my argument—that the increased rates allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the railroads of this country in the last 10 years are not one-tenth of the amount that has been permitted in the way of increases by the principal countries of this world to their railroads. I had occasion to look that up only a short time ago.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not complaining at this increase of rates.

Mr. FORDNEY. Neither am I. I understood the gentleman about that.

Mr. HICKS. I think this rate increase was only on specific articles and not a general increase on all commodities.

Mr. FORDNEY. When it is applied on all articles in general the gentleman will find that the percentage of increase is so small that it does not amount to much. In other words, the Adamson bill increased the operating cost of the railroads of this country, according to the best information I can obtain, more than $100,000,000, and no adequate income has been allowed to the railroads to meet that additional cost. But the principal purpose of this bill is to loan money to the railroads. When I say to you that the railroads were only able to borrow last year three-tenths of 1 per cent of their total capital value you can understand that the money lenders of the country are not anxious to loan to the railroads.

Mr. DILLON. The bill that we just passed relative to the taking over of the railroads provided for loans to the railroads, did it not, and does not that sufficiently supply that need?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman, no.

Mr. DILLON. Why not?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is correct, and yet not exactly correct. The purpose of the $500,000,000 loan authorized in the railroad bill recently passed, as I understand it, is to purchase equipment, to better the railroad systems of the country, to purchase terminals, and buy rolling stock, which the railroad companies have not had the money to purchase. We are in a chaotic condition to-day in the shipment of goods all over this country on every railroad. Now, why? I will tell you why. Because of adverse legislation that I have spoken of, the railroads of the country have not had the money to keep up their betterments, and with the greatly increased production of goods in this country, and products of every kind, the railroad companies have not had the money to build locomotives and cars and better bridges and terminals, and to lay heavier steel, and these roads are at the present time in a condition run down at the heel. This $500,000,000 appropriated in the railroad bill is to answer that purpose, and not to loan to the railroads money they must have for many other betterments.

Mr. DILLON. Does not the bill directly authorize the purchase of bonds issued by the railroads?

Mr. FORDNEY. Railroad bonds?

Mr. DILLON. Yes. The bill itself provides that the Government may buy and sell bonds that may be issued.

Mr. FORDNEY. The bill provides that the President may approve of the issue of bonds authorized by the railroads, in his judgment.

Mr. DILLON. And to purchase?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I beg to differ with the gentleman. It is not to buy railroad bonds. That is not my understanding of the bill.

Mr. DILLON. If the gentleman will examine it, he will find I am correct.

Mr. FORDNEY. When I first read the bill that was my inference, but when you read the bill carefully you will see that it authorizes the President to approve of the issue and sale and purchase of those bonds. I may be wrong about this, and if so I want to be corrected. If there is such a provision in the law, the President ought to be burned in effigy if he steps out now and attempts to purchase railroad bonds on the market to bolster up the value of railroad stocks and bonds. Let me call your attention to the depression in railway stocks and bonds, because it is the gist of this argument. I want to tell you where the stocks and bonds of the railway companies have gone in the past few years. I have here a list of the bond values of 26 of the largest railroads in the United States, bonds of those companies sold since 1906 down to and including 1917. They went all to pieces. Some of you gentlemen are more familiar with some of these roads than with others, as I am; but the 4 per cent bonds of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Road went from 104½ to 83½, their par value being $100. The Atlantic Coast Line went from 95½ to 80; Baltimore & Ohio, from 101½ to 78; Chesapeake & Ohio, from 109 to 70; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, one of the most valuable roads of the country, traversing one of the richest territories in the United States, from 103½ to 81½.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield, or does he desire to finish his statement?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield, although I want to go on with this argument.

Mr. SLOAN. What I desire to know is this: These bonds were supposed to be secure. Does not the gentleman attribute the reduction in the market price of these railroad bonds to the competition of a large amount of Government securities bearing a comparatively high rate of interest, and which are practically exempt from taxation?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, my friend; what I am trying to illustrate is this, that at the time when the Government took control of the railroads their financial situation was critical. Money was very hard to obtain by people who must have money, and the railroads needed more money than any other great industry in the country.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact, perhaps, that the public lost confidence in these railroads on account of the stories of the dishonest operations of some of the officials of these roads, like the New Haven and others?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have heard a great deal about thieves. I never caught but one thief in my life, and I saw him steal and I caught him. I am not ready to convict everybody upon the simple statement that the average man of business is a thief. I do not believe that the average railroad in this country has been so handled that it has gone to pieces because of thieves in its management. Some roads have undoubtedly been mismanaged; not altogether because the management was dishonest, but it was incompetent and perhaps sometimes dishonest along with it. I know of no railroad officials who have been stealing, and if I did know of any I would report them to the Attorney General.

Mr. SABATH. My question was whether, due to the circulation of these reports, and due to the mismanagement on the part of some roads, have not all railroads suffered thereby?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think that is the chief cause.

Mr. SABATH. That is one of the causes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman let me answer, we can not both talk at once, for if we do it will be sort of a half-bred argument.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me answer the gentleman first. I do not believe that because of some mismanagement of a few railroads in the country that is the cause of the depreciation of railroad values in the country. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. There has been no charge of thievery or mismanagement in the roads the gentleman has mentioned, the Union Pacific, Atchison, Burlington, Northwestern, or any of the granger roads, except possibly the Rock Island?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not charging mismanagement of the roads or dishonesty. I do not know of any dishonesty in the management of the great railroads of this country, although I have heard of it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman read the report by the Interstate Commerce Commission which investigated the management of some of these roads?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but not all.

Mr. WALSH. And did not they condemn the management and the way the finances were used?

Mr. FORDNEY. Suppose I did read it all; I would not know anything about it except what a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission said about it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman would if he read the testimony and was able to form an opinion, and I know the gentleman is.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I was not present. Now, if the gentleman will let me proceed, I want to be kind to everybody, because I have no ill will against anybody.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman tell me what period of time lies between the high valuation of the bonds and the lower valuation?

Mr. FORDNEY. From 1906 down to date, but chiefly in the last two years.

Mr. JUUL. Two years between the high and the low value.

Mr. FORDNEY. Between 1906—that is the farthest period of time back—down to the 1st of January, 1917, and from that to December, 1917.

Now, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road's bonds declined from 98⅛ to 69; the Chicago & North Western from 100⅛ to 70½; the Delaware & Hudson from 103 to 87; the Great Northern from 101⅛ to 86; and so on down the whole 26. I will not take the time to read them all. The average shrinkage of all these bonds of these companies was 16⅜ per cent on all the roads.

Now, the value is there. The value of the stock depends on the value of the property, and not only upon its value but upon the successful management of the companies. You may have an institution with a million dollars of capital paid in and a million dollars' worth of property and a million dollars of par value of stock, but your stock is not worth 2 cents on the dollar unless that institution is successfully managed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman speaks of the depreciation of railroad bonds; the gentleman is aware that all bonds have greatly depreciated in value?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but, my friend, the railroads are in a chaotic condition financially to-day, and the purpose of this bill is really to aid the railroads more than any other industry, in my opinion. All values have shrunk in the country and so have stocks since the war has been declared.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I had here the other day a chart which I intended to use when we were discussing the railroad bill, which made a comparison of the rise and fall of railroad bonds and other bonds and railroad stocks and other stocks, and there was no appreciable difference in the rise and fall between railroad stocks and other stocks. They all depreciated in the same ratio and in the same way.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman's argument is evidence that the financial circumstances of the roads are in bad shape. Financiers having the money do not want to loan it, and so it makes it impossible to get money at reasonable rates of interest. That is the purpose of this bill—to aid such industries in getting money.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the provisions of section 7 of the railroad bill:

> The President may, out of the revolving fund created by this act, purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities whenever, in his judgment, it is desirable at prices not less than the cost thereof.

Mr. FORDNEY. What is the purpose of that? The purpose is that if the railroad comes to the Government to get any portion of the $500,000,000 to buy betterments, rolling stock, heavier steel rails for terminals to add to the betterments of the railroads, all the railroad companies have got to offer to the Government is their stock and bonds, whatever security they may have, but it does not authorize the President to go out and promiscuously buy railroad bonds on the market.

Mr. DILLON. Let me read a further provision in reference to the reorganization of these companies.

Mr. FORDNEY. I wish the gentleman would not take up all of my time. I will concede that the President has authority to buy these bonds, but the money put into the bonds is to go to the railroad companies for betterments of the railroad, and it does not authorize him to buy bonds floating around the country issued 10 years ago. The gentleman and I disagree only as to the purpose.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman stated that the purpose of the bill is to aid the railroads. Does the gentleman find the word "railroad" in the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; and I do not find the word "sugar-coated," and yet it is sugar-coated from top to bottom. There is nothing in the bill about railroads, but you will agree that the railroads are in the worst condition to-day financially than any other industry of the country and will get the major portion of these loans.

It was stated by the Secretary of the Treasury and by Mr. Warburg, who appeared before our committee, that they feel they must within the next 30 days, I believe, loan to the New Haven Railroad $45,000,000. That is one to begin with. Now, you can take care of a whole lot of little institutions in the country with $45,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to inject the fact, however, that under this bill the limit of the amount that could be loaned directly to the railroads is one-sixth of the outstanding capital stock.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but one-fifth of $500,000,000 is $100,000,000, and with that capitalization there would still be $55,000,000 left.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think the idea of the Secretary of the Treasury was not that this corporation would loan that entire amount to the New Haven Railroad Co.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I think not. I think I rather exaggerated that.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. But that if they would loan a considerable per cent of it, the banks would be willing and able to take care of the rest of the loan to the company.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Let me get to the gist of the point. The committee threw safeguards around the bill to that extent, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has fully explained, that not more than 10 per cent of the capital and issue of bonds can be loaned to institutions directly by this corporation. The remaining 90 per cent must come through the local banks with the indorsement of the local banks. The difference between those two loans is this: The purpose of this bill is to loan to local banks, National or State, 75 per cent of the money that the bank loans directly to the institution, and only 75 per cent, but that bank must indorse that note on which the loan is made. The loans to be made through the local banks, National or State, must be secured and that security turned over to this Finance Corporation with the collaterals and notes, together with the indorsement of the local bank of that note. That is double security, but the direct loans authorized up to 10 per cent may be made by the Finance Corporation directly to the company or individual without the indorsement of any bank. But in such loans the corporation then must demand 133 cents collateral securities for 100 cents of loan. That is the difference between the two loans. That loan when obtained directly through the institution with 133 cents of collateral on 100 cents of loan is not as good as the loan that comes through the local bank, because there is an additional 33⅓ per cent collateral required with the loan through the bank, and in addition to that, there is the indorsement of the local bank, and that class of loans is better than the direct loan.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REED. This corporation, which is temporary, and which has been denominated as rotten, can only provide for loans for a five-year period.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; the corporation must cease six months after the proclamation of peace.

Mr. REED. Who will take care of the railroads then?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let them go to hades or let the country take care of them. We do not want the Government forever to take care of them. We expect normal conditions once more to prevail, and when normal conditions have once more returned to the country, we will go on as we have in the past, and the Federal reserve banks and the local banks will take care of the industries of the country. There are now unusual conditions prevailing throughout the whole country, and this is intended to take care of those conditions under those circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For how long a term can this corporation loan to an institution engaged in war industries?

Mr. FORDNEY. Five years is the limit. I did not quite fully answer the other question. Under the provisions of this bill the activities and powers of the corporation must cease six months after the proclamation of peace, and the business of the corporation must be closed within 10 years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do I understand they could loan to a manufacturing institution for five years?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; the longest loan that can be taken is five years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On commercial paper?

Mr. FORDNEY. On any kind of security back of any note offered to the corporation. Five years is the limit that they can make the loans for, either directly or through the local banks, because we expect this war will end some time, and we are all praying that it will end in a short time; but we are trying to take care of the industrial world while this war is going on and aid every institution that is aiding the Government to support our boys in the trenches over across the sea. That is the meat of this thing.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that perhaps he is conveying to the committee an impression of undue optimism. He stated that we would return to normal conditions before long after the war. I thought perhaps he meant he hoped we would.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; I hope and I expect. The people of this country are intelligent, and if they make a mistake they will soon correct it.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman stated that the power to loan would cease in five years?

Mr. FORDNEY. In six months after the proclamation of peace.

Mr. JUUL. If there is power in this bill to grant loans there must be power to renew loans where there is inability to pay, must there not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but they are not supposed to be renewed after six months after a proclamation of peace. The powers of the corporation must cease then, except the winding up of its business.

Mr. JUUL. What happens when there is inability to pay?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you what came mighty near happening to me in the panic of 1896. If I had had anything, I would have "busted," and that would be their fix if they are unable to go elsewhere and get money except through this corporation, because this corporation's business must end six months after the war is over; they are likely to be embarrassed.

It was thought best to control the new institution, and say to a city, for instance, that wanted to build a city hall that cost half a million dollars, "You can wait just as well until this war is over when we will not need that money for other purposes. And we will not issue a license to any bank in the country to finance that project until the war is over."

Mr. HICKS. If this committee does not have the power to prevent that corporation from issuing that new issue of stocks and bonds, what value is it to have the provision put in the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you the benefit that I think there is in it. I thought at first that that original provision in there was too drastic, and that it might be used for political purposes where it was possible to do so. If the corporation, or if this corporation, does not recommend the issuance of stocks or bonds to be sold to finance a corporation for more than $100,000, the banks that must look to this finance corporation for loans are going to be very slow to make those loans unless they know this corporation is going to indorse such loans, and consequently it will have practically the same effect as the old provision that was in the law, in my opinion. I do not believe that a bank that must look to this finance corporation for rediscounts would finance a corporation that this committee would disapprove of for fear the finance corporation would decline to give aid to your bank any further.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman explain how the finance corporation is to get its funds, and from what source?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. The gentleman from North Carolina took two hours a while ago to tell you that, and I thought he told you plainly. I will be very brief. In the first place, the Government is to take $500,000,000 of stock of this company and put up the cash extracted from people in taxes. Beyond that they are going to issue bonds of the corporation, back of which they claim they have got collateral security from direct loans or from local banks of the country, and in addition to what is back of those bonds is this $500,000,000 in cash put in the Treasury by the Government. They expect to sell bonds and get money in addition to the $500,000,000 subscribed by the Government. Has that answered your question?

Mr. McFADDEN. Whom are they going to sell the bonds to?

Mr. FORDNEY. To you and to anybody else who has money and courage enough to buy them.

Mr. McFADDEN. They are made eligible for rediscount?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to you that I differ with my good friend from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, in this respect. I believe the Government should be back of these bonds as well as the corporation. Whether they are or whether they are not, if you and I live long enough, and if this corporation meets with reverses and losses to amount to more than $500,000,000 subscribed by the Government in stock, Uncle Sam through some future Congress will come forward and say to the man that loaned his money, "You loaned that money to this corporation in time of great need and that corporation loaned it to some institution furnishing supplies to support my boys on the battle field, and Uncle Sam will pay you 100 cents on the dollar." [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman think that these bonds will sell in competition with liberty bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is a provision in the bill which provides that these bonds must not be sold at less than par, but what they will sell for I do not know. But that is what the law says.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The inquiry in my mind is this: Suppose we issue these bonds and find they will not sell, then we will have to take some similar action like that which we took in the matter of the Federal farm-loan bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I never had any faith in that farm-loan scheme. I think that was a fake. But if it is found that this corporation's bonds will not sell at par, mark what I tell you, the administration will be right back and ask Congress for some relief, and we will give it as best we can. That is what will happen, my good friend.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman not think that the interest rate will make them sell at par if the interest rate is high enough?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think so.

Now, let me say to you, my good friends, this: I will not mention the firm, but the Secretary of the Treasury made the statement before our committee that one great corporation in this country that is doing very much toward aiding in the production of supplies by furnishing power to great institutions is at the present time in financial trouble; and it is expected that this corporation is going to lend aid to that company, that recently was compelled to pay 13 per cent interest on a loan they obtained in New York. And when it is understood that company can come to this corporation and get money at a reasonable rate of interest the local bank is going to loan that money at a reasonable rate of interest or give up the loan.

It is going to be a good thing in that way. As to whether or not this is inflation, let me say, that here is the dangerous part of it, but we need not be afraid of that. Uncle Sam never got in such deep water but that he was able to wade ashore high and dry and pay his debts. We were practically out of debt before this war began. We pay our debts. We are the wealthiest people in the world, with $260,000,000,000 of wealth in the United States; and with thirty or forty billions of indebtedness nobody need fear that Uncle Sam will not pay his debts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Granting that, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has given any consideration to the thought of the possibility of the fact that if the Government is not out-and-out behind these bonds it will inevitably lead by the Government to the ownership of the railroads?

Mr. FORDNEY. As long as God gives me intelligence and my health and strength and my constituents permit me to remain here I will vote against Government ownership of railroads, because that would bring financial disaster to our Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But in spite of the gentleman's vote, the bond situation, with the Government apparently not being behind them, will result in the ownership of the railroads.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think it will, but if it does, if this Government through any legislation that we are passing now to help out this war, becomes the possessor of a railroad in this country, oh, how quick Uncle Sam will let go as soon as the people open their eyes and find out what an expensive proposition the Government has on hand.

No country in the world has tried Government ownership and control and operation of railroads that did not make a failure of it; not a country in the world. Right over here in Canada, across the border, the railroads in private ownership spent $73 in operating costs for each $100 of receipts or income, while the Government-owned roads, traversing some of the best and richest territory in Canada, spent $102.13 to get back $100. That is the difference between a Government-managed institution and one managed by an individual or a corporation.

As a little illustration here, we had a little flurry of snow this winter, 3 or 4 or 5 or 6 inches of snowfall, and a man came and asked me to aid him, if possible, in getting some coal hauled to his home, because he said the coal companies of the city claimed they had no means of transporting the coal to his home. They had the coal, but no means of transporting it. I saw 24 teams lined up about this Capitol hauling snow down to the Potomac River, trying to raise the height of the water. [Laughter.] They could have had no other purpose. Why in the world did not they shovel the snow to one side, as we do in Michigan, where we have 3 or 4 feet of snow? No; more than a score of teams hauling snow from the Capitol, with no transportation available to haul coal to individuals needing it. That is an illustration of Government management. [Applause.]

I will give another illustration. Since the Government took over the management of the railroads a man came to me the other day and said, "I was down by Collingdale, 26 miles outside of Philadelphia, and there I saw 147 carloads of coal that had lain there 42 days without unloading or moving. But that is Government ownership. Great Scott!

A carload of goods arrived in this city on the 2d day of March that had been shipped from the city of Detroit, 700 miles away, on the 28th of December. It took 63 days to get that carload of goods from Detroit to the city of Washington under Government management. No wonder that we have a shortage of cars.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? That was before Government management.

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir; we now have Government control, since December 28 last. The very day the Government took over the railroads that carload of goods was shipped from the city of Detroit, 700 miles away, and it took 63 days to get that carload of goods to Washington.

Mr. SABATH. I suppose the gentleman thinks that the Secretary of the Treasury or the Director ought to have been on that train and ordered the goods shipped down here.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me call your attention to the situation to-day. There are some things about this bill that I do not like, but I am going to support it because it is going to give relief to the financial institutions of the country. It is absolutely necessary, gentlemen, to pass it in order to avoid a money panic. All the outstanding money in the country is redeemable in gold under existing law. Silver is redeemable in gold.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Later I will yield. Silver certificates are redeemable in silver and gold certificates are redeemable in gold. There are gold certificates outstanding at present to the extent of $1,235,000,000. Six months ago we had over $1,800,000,000 of gold certificates outstanding. Back of every gold certificate outstanding to-day there is 100 cents of gold coin or gold bullion in the United States Treasury to redeem it when it comes back. Those gold certificates are now being called in and Federal reserve bank notes are issued in their place, back of which there is but 40 cents of gold coin or gold bullion. In other words, we are issuing $2.50 of Federal reserve notes against $1 of gold. This is inflation.

In addition there are $1,875,000 of United States notes, $346,381,000 Treasury; and Federal reserve notes, of $1,505,000; of Federal reserve bank notes, $11,898,000; and $719,000,000 of national-bank notes; or a total paper money outstanding and silver combined of $4,358,000,000, with $2,400,000,000 of gold to redeem it with. This is inflation.

We are going to keep on issuing more Federal reserve bank notes until all the gold certificates of the country have been called in and destroyed and Federal reserve bank notes issued in their place—that is, $2.50 for $1, or about $5,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes outstanding as against a little less than $2,000,000,000 of gold certificates heretofore. But we have to have the money, and I have no criticism to offer. I only call your attention to the importance of these things.

We are going far afield in legislation, gentlemen. I have voted for everything that the administration has asked for, in the way of power or appropriations or bond issues, to help carry on this war. I am going to vote for everything, in my judgment, that the administration needs. I have entirely forgotten politics in this House while this war lasts.

But the administration is asking at the present time for more power than it ought to ask for, and one that I am unalterably opposed to and am going to express myself right here, and I want you to think about it: There was introduced in the Senate the so-called Chamberlain bill, which, if enacted into law as it was introduced, would give the President of the United States the power to take over all the sawmills, all the lumber camps, the entire production of lumber, and all the timber of the United States, and to direct management.

Now, anything under the blue sky could be directed under the language of that bill by the President of the United States. Gentlemen, that bill was introduced upon the theory that the sawmills of the South are declining and have refused to furnish to this Government timber with which to build ships. That is a mistake. The man that conceived that idea was uninformed. I know better. I have examined timber in nearly every State in the South, and I am a manufacturer of lumber in the State of Mississippi, where as fine long-leaf timber and as large grows as grows anywhere under God's sun.

The Government has asked for large sticks of timber, say, 24 by 24 inches square, and from 30 feet long up to any length that can be obtained, chiefly 40-foot lengths. I want to tell you, my friends, that to saw a stick of timber 24 by 24 inches square and 40 feet long in a sawmill means that you must have a stick of timber absolutely straight, absolutely round, and absolutely perfect, about 38 inches in diameter at the top end. I venture to say there is scarcely a tree of long-leaf pine standing in any Southern State that will make a stick of timber 24 by 24 inches square and 40 feet long with a proud edge or an absolutely square edge. I say it takes a stick 38 inches at the top end to make a stick of that kind, and the shipbuilding corporations were so notified when they went out onto the market last year and asked for that size of timber from the mills of the South to build ships. They were told, "Go to the Pacific coast, where you can get your large dimensions, and the mills of the South will furnish you to their fullest capacity and limit all the timber that can be made out of the standing timber in the South." They declined to do that and said they could not mix Douglas fir from the Pacific coast with long-leaf timber from the South.

Finally they have discovered that they can mix them and that they will properly mix, because the tensile strength of a stick of timber cut from Douglas fir and of a stick of timber cut from long-leaf pine of the South is practically the same. I saw a test made at the World's Fair at Chicago, and the pressure before the timber gave way was 282 points on Douglas fir as against 285 points for long-leaf pine—practically the same. At last the corporation obtaining timber for shipbuilding in the South have found they can not secure these large timbers from the South, and have gone to the Pacific coast, as lumbermen advised them to do last May. But they come back now and say they are obliged to go to the Pacific coast, because the lumbermen of the South are disloyal and will not cut timber for them for shipbuilding. That is not true. Any man who makes that statement is not well posted. [Applause.] I am opposed to that bill. There are 48,000 sawmills in the United States, employing, in round numbers, 900,000 men. Those 48,000 sawmills have 48,000 skilled, experienced superintendents running them. No man in the White House or any other house in the city of Washington can sit in a cushioned chair behind a mahogany desk and direct the management of 48,000 sawmills scattered all over this country as efficiently as can 48,000 superintendents right on the ground and knowing their business. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is there any real difference between apparently running them from headquarters in Washington and sending men into the lumber districts who fix a 10-hour day on an 8-hour basis and regulate the entire pay roll, commencing with $100 a month for second cooks, thereby establishing that scale?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman that about three months ago, when there was a strike in the sawmills and lumber camps of the Pacific coast in Oregon and in Washington, a man came there from California and called the lumbermen together and advised them what to do. The mills were closed down for three months. The I. W. W. would not let them run. They were destroying property, burning timber, blowing up dams, burning the landings where logs were landed, smashing machinery in the woods, doing every vicious thing that a wicked mind could think of——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Putting emery into the oil.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and putting camphor into the gasoline that ran the little motor engines to supply water to the donkey engines in the woods. Camphor spoils the gasoline. Gasoline with camphor in it will not run an engine. They put emery dust in the cylinders and in the grease boxes to destroy the machinery. They took sledges in the night and smashed the gearing, the drive wheels, which threw the machines out of commission for three or four weeks. While this was going on, that man came up there from California and claimed to be a representative of the Government sent there by the President. He advised that the lumbermen accept all the conditions demanded by the I. W. W., saying that if they did so everything would run smoothly. I was not present, but I know some gentlemen who were.

One gentleman from California, a lumberman, operating there and in the State of Oregon, said to him, "You were a professor in a certain college down in southern California at one time, were you not?" "Yes." "You were kicked out because you were teaching socialistic ideas. Let me say to you, go back to California and tell your people that we have enough socialism and anarchy here without you, and tell Woodrow Wilson that we are going to run our institutions without advice from any anarchists from southern California." [Applause.] That is the kind of aid that the administration at that time gave to the institutions that were struggling with rampant anarchy on the Pacific coast in every industry. This bill that I am talking about is now before the Senate. I appeared before the Senate committee the other day and opposed that bill, and I believe it is going to be amended so that the President may commandeer timber, may commandeer lumber all he wants, but he will have to keep his hands off the throttle in the management of these mills. I believe that bill will pass the Senate in some such modified form, and when it comes here I want you to give it very careful consideration.

Gentlemen, I am going to close. I have talked much longer than I intended to. I am in favor of this pending bill, because I know that this $500,000,000, and this $2,000,000,000-bond authorization, will put enough more money in circulation in this country to aid the institutions that must have financial aid or else stop their operations or go into the hands of receivers. We have thrown safeguards around this bill in every particular. It would take me too long to explain all those things, but I am willing to answer any questions I am able to answer, asked by any man, whether opposed to the bill or in favor of the bill. I am going to support the bill. I want the men who are appointed to handle this money and place these loans to be men of the highest character, and I believe they will do their duty and make these loans where they are most needed, and that they will safeguard the interests of Uncle Sam and not loan money where it should not be loaned. It is not to be expected that they can loan it all perfectly and get it all back. That is beyond human ability in my opinion, because there is not a bank in this country, no matter how carefully and well managed, with the best talent there is in the land, which does not make some loans that fail. If this corporation makes loans on which they may never get back 100 cents for 100 cents I will not criticize them if they are as judicial in their loans as the average great banks of the country. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] one hour.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, you listened this morning to a very able, exhaustive, and clear explanation of the details of this bill from the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. I shall not attempt to take up those details. All that I could say would be a mere repetition of what he said. Neither shall I discuss the question as to whether or not the particular object of this bill is to benefit the railroads of the country, as alleged by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. While I believe that something of that sort is intended, and while something of that sort should be done, it occurs to me that inasmuch as we have limited the amount that can be directly loaned to any railroad or other corporation to one-sixth of the entire amount of the capital and bonds to be issued that loaning to railroads is more or less a negligible part of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, is it not limited to 10 per cent of the capital?

Mr. LONGWORTH. To 16 per cent of the capital and the amount of bonds authorized to be issued on that capital.

What I desire at the outset to discuss in some detail is the original bill submitted to us and the effect that the passage of that bill might have had upon the country.

The fashion has been growing of late, particularly when bills of major importance are before us, that the sponsors of these bills on the floor of this House rest their main grounds for defense of their provisions upon the proposition that they were drafted in some executive department. Members of committees reporting these bills advocate and recommend them not because they reflect their views but because they reflect the views of some one else. Since I have been a Member of this House I have never seen such a flagrant illustration of this sort of legislation as in the case of the railroad bill passed last week. Time and time again the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and other members resisted amendments to certain sections of the bill on the sole ground that they were drafted elsewhere than in the committee room—in the office of the Director of Railroads, perhaps, or in the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or in the offices of certain railroad attorneys who were presumed to know exactly what the railroads wanted—and hence we were described as meddlers when we sought to disturb the work of any of these gentlemen by so much as the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

Things have come to a pretty pass, gentlemen, if legislation in this House, in this Congress, is to be simply a matter of Executive order, if committees of this House are to be mere legislative machines for registering the will of the Executive. For one, I believe the time has come to definitely impress upon the Executive and upon the country that we propose to do some thinking for ourselves. [Applause.] That we propose to scrutinize rigidly the legislative proposals sent to us from the other end of the Avenue, and to enact them with such additions, subtractions, and alterations as seem best to us, acting in the capacity imposed upon us by the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] In short, that we propose to conduct ourselves as legislative representatives of the American people and not merely as amanuenses of those holding executive office. [Applause.]

The Committee on Ways and Means, in recommending this bill, do so not upon the plea that some one else made it for us, but because we made it for you. [Applause.] It is true, of course, that we present this bill in response to the request from the Treasury Department for the creation of the financial machinery thought necessary, and as we have concluded, after full discussion and hearing absolutely essential to the proper financing of the war. But we have built the legislative framework of that machinery ourselves, we have hung a respectably sized monkey wrench on the safety valve and we have changed engineers. [Laughter.]

Probably few of you realize—the gentleman from North Carolina indicated it to you this morning—but probably few of you realize, who did not study it closely, the absolute revolutionary character of this bill as originally presented to us. It gave to William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, Director of the Railways of the United States, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, and holder of several other vastly important offices, in addition to the powers he already possesses, the power to advance or withhold from the banking institutions and the industrial corporations of this country credits to the extent of $4,500,000,000.

I say that these powers were entrusted to William G. McAdoo, for while I concede there was to be associated with him a board of four other gentlemen, yet inasmuch as he had the power to appoint them, to dismiss them at will, with the veto absolutely over anything they might do, they would have been about as pitiful a collection of dummies as it is possible to conceive. Furthermore, the bill gave to him a power perhaps even more vast and far-reaching, that of licensing or refusing to license the issue of securities in any amount over $100,000 by any person, firm, or corporation in the United States. Even that was not all. As if the powers specifically granted in the act were not enough to make him the undisputed master of American industry and finance, tucked away rather inconspicuously in the body of the bill there appeared this provision, entirely unexampled in the legislative history of this country, and I commend it to the attention of the constitutional lawyers of the House:

Provided, That the powers specifically enumerated herein shall be deemed in addition to and not in limitation of any implied powers granted in this act.

Where would have been the limit to the powers that Mr. McAdoo could have exercised under such a provision as that? Do you realize what it would mean to concentrate such powers in the hands of one man? Take the first of them only, that of the extension or the refusal to extend credit to the amount of $4,500,000,000. It is difficult for gentlemen, even those who have been dealing in these vast amounts in the last few months, to realize what a credit $4,500,000,000 means. Let me give you a very few illustrations of the vastness of this sum. Possibly you are familiar with some of them. It would be equivalent to an expenditure at the rate of nearly $4.50 a minute for every minute that has elapsed up to to-day since the birth of Christ. It would be four and one-half times as much as it ever cost this Government to live in any year hitherto. It would be about equivalent—and I shall ask my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] to correct me if I am wrong, because I heard him cite these figures—to the combined national and State debt, together with the debts of every county, city, village, and township in the United States before the war. That is substantially correct, is it not?

Mr. SLOAN. Add together the national debt and all State, county, and municipal debts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would have financed three times over the Boer War in Africa. It would have financed three times over the total cost of the Crimean War. It would have financed twice over the total cost of the Russo-Japanese War. It would have come within 30 per cent of financing the entire cost of all the Napoleonic wars, which lasted more than 22 years. It would have come within 40 per cent of financing the entire cost of the Civil War. And it was proposed to grant to one man, at his own request, the power to manipulate this huge sum as he pleased. In addition to this, it was proposed to give him the power to grant or withhold from any firm or corporation the right to borrow money to the extent of more than $100,000. Pause, gentlemen, and reflect for a moment upon what that would mean. You will all remember the investigation authorized by this Congress some years ago of the so-called Money Trust, during which the fact was developed, or it was alleged to have been developed, through cross-examinations of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, of Mr. Baker, president of the First National Bank of New York, and some other master financiers, that there existed a coterie of men in this country, consisting of themselves and 9 or 10 other individuals and institutions, without whose consent it would be difficult, if not practically impossible, for any corporation in the United States to issue securities to the extent of $10,000,000. Gentlemen on this floor orated themselves black in the face about the danger of the concentration of such powers within the hands of a small number of individuals. What will you say to concentrating a power vastly greater in the hands of one ambitious man? These two powers—that of controlling credit and that of controlling the issue of securities—would have made of Mr. McAdoo the arbiter of the business and the finance of America. No war lord in history, no Czar or Kaiser, ever had such power as this. He would have been in position to make or break men, to make or break corporations. He could build up or destroy communities. His smile could have made a State blossom as a rose; his frown could have made of it an industrial wilderness.

The mere transmittal to Congress of such a bill is illustrative of the danger every day growing in menace to the institutions bequeathed us by our fathers. I mean the continuous reaching out by the Executive for more and more power. It is a danger not lightly to be passed over. It demands the prayerful consideration of thoughtful legislators. On about the same day this bill made its appearance in this House, and you will all remember that my genial friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was not very enthusiastic about it at the time, a bill known as the Overman bill made its appearance in the Senate, also prepared at the other end of the Avenue, designed to turn over to the President the power to remodel our system of government in any way he saw fit. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that if these two bills had passed in the form in which it was hoped and intended they should pass, the Congress of the United States might just as well have abdicated. Possibly we might, as a matter of form, have been called together once a year to vote appropriations of forty or fifty billion of dollars to the Executive, but beyond that we would not have had any excuse for existence. If it were contemplated to found a dynasty in this country, no more effective steps could have been taken to that end than by the passage of these two bills as originally drawn. No one contends that the Executive should not have extraordinary powers in time of war. No loyal man in Congress will refuse to grant to the President or to his subordinates, within or without the family circle, all the money necessary to the prosecution of the war to the limit, but thoughtful men must realize that second only to defeat is the danger that when this war is over it may be found difficult, if not impossible, to restore the Government to its ordinary status in time of peace, with all of its checks and balances in full force and effect necessary to the Government of a free people.

Congress owes it to itself, we owe it to the people who sent us here, to see to it that our grant to the Executive of money and power, while generous even to the point of bringing Executive domination during the war, must not be permitted to lead to Executive usurpation after the war. [Applause.]

The Committee on Ways and Means has been fully alive to the grave dangers of this bill, as I hope the committee which will have charge of the Overman bill will be alive to its dangers. We have consulted together, as the chairman said this morning, for days and days; we have considered this bill section by section, line by line, and word by word. We have hacked it and pruned it and remodeled it, until now all of us feel that while we have given to the Treasury Department and to the Secretary all the machinery necessary to the proper financing of the war, the features dangerous to the perpetuation of American institutions have been eliminated. [Applause.]

I will not undertake to discuss the present bill, except as to four or five cardinal points. In the first place, we have provided for two committees instead of one, and have divided their responsibilities. We have taken from the Secretary of the Treasury the power to appoint either of those committees. We have limited the amount that can be advanced. We have taken away the absolute power to license or refuse to license the selling of securities and, except in a case where it may be necessary for the development of a fixed line of policy, we have taken away the veto power from the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, all of this, gentlemen, has been accomplished without a word of politics, without a suggestion of partisanship, without a division based in any instance upon party lines. This complete absence of partisanship, and that has been characteristic of the deliberations of the Ways and Means Committee since a state of war was declared, is particularly noteworthy, because it is the first time in this country that the Ways and Means Committee has not divided on partisan lines.

Scarcely ever before has any measure of major importance come from that committee except where a partisan division has taken place. Indeed, most of the great finance and revenue bills have for years been framed by the majority without consultation even with the minority. Take the Payne bill, for instance. When we framed it not a Democrat was permitted anywhere near the committee room, and the Democratic Party returned the compliment in not permitting us access to the committee room when the Underwood bill was being framed. But in this emergency, from the beginning until now, and the chairman will bear me out, there has not been in subcommittee or in full committee one single division based on party lines. [Applause.] Republicans have voted not as Republicans; Democrats have voted not as Democrats; they have voted only as Americans. [Applause.] That same forgetfulness of partisanship has been characteristic of the actions and deliberations of this House upon all war measures.

Let me recall to you the eloquent valedictory of our honored Speaker on the closing day of the last session, when he said:

> I think every Member of this House has contributed all that was in him to the support of the Government of the United States in this great emergency. So far as I have been able to observe, and I have observed very closely, partisan politics have been temporarily banished from this House. I think every man has given the utmost patriotism to the service here.

And over in the Senate the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, formerly the leader of his party in this House, and perhaps the leading spokesman to-day of the administration, said this:

> Are we not all trying to do our very best? Is there a Senator on either side of the Chamber who is not behind the American people in this war, except a few fool pacifists that have now pretty nearly passed out of political existence?

But since the question of this fact has been raised on this floor and elsewhere, I intend to very briefly recapitulate the legislative action of the Republican Party upon all war measures passed at this and the last session of Congress. Summed up in a sentence, gentlemen, since the day war was declared, and even before that, when it had to do with any question of preparedness for the national defense, the Republican Party, whenever called upon in the interest of the efficient prosecution of the war, has stood behind the President of the United States with practical unanimity. [Applause.]

Furthermore, its support of the administration's war program has in every case been at least as effective, and in some cases it has furnished a larger proportion of supporters than the President's own party. There was one measure, for instance, which for far-reaching importance stands out above all others enacted in the last session of Congress, the measure asked for and urged by the President as absolutely essential to our effective participation in the war; I mean the selective-draft law. Had it not been for the fact that the Republican Party gave to the President in that crisis even more effective support than did his own party, that measure might never have been enacted into law, and our position to-day, in all probability, would have been little less than a national humiliation. The committee in charge of the bill could not muster the votes necessary among the majority to report it to the House, and when a leader was sought to pilot it through the President could find no member of his party willing to assume charge, and he was forced to apply to a member of the Republican Party, the Hon. JULIUS KAHN, of California [applause], to direct the passage of the bill through the House. How well he led it is illustrated by the fact that while at the outset, as you will remember, it was freely predicted that the selective-draft measure would fail, yet on its final passage it received 313 votes for and 109 against it. Of the affirmative votes, Republicans contributed 169 and Democrats 144. To the opposition Republicans furnished 42 votes and Democrats 67, so that the plurality of Republican votes for the selective-draft act was 127 and of Democrats but 77. In other words, 25 more Republicans than Democrats voted to support the President and 23 more Democrats than Republicans joined the opposition to the President.

I have given these figures not in criticism of gentlemen, Democrats or Republicans, for voting against the selective draft, but in answer only to the charge or the suggestion that Republicans have not at all times supported the President of the United States in the efficient prosecution of the war. The fact is that in every measure recommended by this administration for the arming of the Nation and for the filling of its Treasury we have given to the President more effective support than has his own party, and that had he been compelled to rely upon his party only, if we had assumed an attitude of opposition, this Government would be to-day without the means and the men necessary to make our participation in the war anything more than a farce.

From the beginning we have scrupulously avoided seeking any partisan advantage. We have sought to keep politics out of any discussion, and we have succeeded in so far as we have been concerned, but not, unfortunately, in so far as some members of the opposite party have been concerned.

Were it not for the fact that our actions and motives have been called in question on the floors of both Houses of Congress and elsewhere I would not have alluded to the matter that I am going to speak of now, and I do so not with any intent to criticize the majority or of any Member of it, but only in justice to this side of the House. Since we entered the war, gentlemen, nine Members of this House have voluntarily left Congress. Of these, five were Democrats and four Republicans. The resignations of the five Democratic Members were avowedly for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that was for the betterment of their financial condition.

Mr. Adamson is now drawing a salary much larger than he received here, in a life position. Mr. Fitzgerald is, we are all delighted to hear, now enjoying a most lucrative law practice. Messrs. Bruckner, Griffin, and Hulbert are holding extremely profitable offices under the Tammany administration of the city of New York. For this assuredly I do not blame them. They thought it advisable and necessary to make adequate financial provision for the future, and from that point of view they are entirely right. There has not been in my time in Congress a man who has so well, by his distinguished services to his country, earned an assured financial independence that he could never have attained here as has our old friend Fitzgerald. [Applause.]

The reasons for the withdrawal of these gentlemen from Congress were highly laudable, but it can hardly be said that in their present sphere of action they are contributing in any great degree to the winning of the war.

Upon this side four men have left Congress. Theirs was a different purpose, but will you say that it was one less laudable? All four of them left to enter the military service of the United States. They were Gardner, LAGUARDIA, HEINTZ, and JOHNSON of South Dakota. [Applause.] LAGUARDIA is now abroad. HEINTZ is in camp at Montgomery, Ala., hoping soon to go to France. JOHNSON is a private soldier in a near-by encampment. Gardner has "gone west." A colonel, he was demoted to the rank of major at his own request, hoping thereby to get sooner to the trenches. He died a victim to his ambition to render fighting service to this country. [Applause.]

The experience of those who are left has, from a financial standpoint, been obviously unfortunate. Take the situation of my colleague, Capt. HEINTZ, for instance, and I speak with knowledge of the situation. None too abundantly gifted with the world's goods, his law practice has gone to pieces. He draws no salary either from the legislative or military branch of the Government. Although his name is carried on the roll of this House, although he would have the right to vote if he were here to-day, although his office is maintained in the House Office Building, and the routine business of his district is being transacted, he is not permitted to draw one cent of his salary for clerk hire. Comparisons are always odious, but on the facts as I have stated them, and as you know them, do you not think that we are justified in resenting the accusation that Republicans in this House have at any time put politics above patriotism?

Mr. POU. Nobody has made it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. On the contrary it has been made, and I am about to come to just that point. A Member of another body not long ago made a speech, filled with abuse of the Republican Party and of some of its leaders, and I had hoped that that sort of thing would have stopped there. But more recently unfortunately a Member of this House brought in politics for the first time since the war began, and since the time he did so he has been elevated to the position of leader of the campaign for the reelection of gentlemen upon that side of the aisle. About two or three weeks ago the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] had published in the RECORD—and you all heard the debate about it—with his announced approval of its sentiments, an editorial written by one Martin H. Glynn, sometime governor of the State of New York, and more recently the chairman of the last Democratic national convention—permanent or temporary, I have forgotten which. Since that time I have seen this editorial published as a paid advertisement in a Washington newspaper, coming from what source I do not know. This editorial is compounded in about equal proportions of venom and falsehood, and it would not be worthy of notice, except for the statement that the criticism of some of the war policies of this administration made by various persons in the last few months is, and I quote, "A well-laid plan, nicely trained and strategically timed. Its purpose, no matter how secretive its sponsors, how insinuating its methods, how seductive its arguments, is to give the Republican Party a majority in the next House of Representatives and pave the way for a Republican President in 1920."

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] must admit that that is a criticism of our patriotism here, as Members of this body.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, when I inadvertently stated a while ago that nobody had made the charge I meant that so far as I recollected no gentleman on this side of the Chamber has impugned the patriotism of any other gentleman on that side, and I think I am safe in saying that is so. I was not speaking of any quotation from any outsider.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Ah, but that is not a quotation from an outsider; it was brought in by a responsible leader on that side, with the definite statement that he approved and indorsed it.

Mr. MADDEN. And reintroduced when his attention was called to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reintroduced; and he had it read here in his time, taking 20 minutes to have it read, so as to more fully impress it upon the Members of the House and upon the galleries.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And he admitted that it was partisan.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He admitted that it was partisan, and that he himself indorsed it, and since that time he has been made chairman of your campaign committee. I acquit every one whom I see before me of any such statement as that. I am only pointing out that we on this side have the right to resent the introduction here by a leading man on that side of that sort of stuff.

Now, in the first place, the crass silliness of such a proposition is evident from the fact that the most vigorous criticism of the war policy of this administration has come, not from Republicans at all, but from rock-ribbed militant Democrats like Senator CHAMBERLAIN and Senator HITCHCOCK, Henry Watterson and Desha Breckinridge, who demand the instant removal of Secretary Baker, all of whom have been more outspoken in their criticisms than any member of my party. Do you suppose that any of these men are animated by a desire to elect a Republican House of Representatives? Why, it would be easier for a camel to traverse the eye of a needle than for any Republican to get the vote of any one of them for any office. I make the positive assertion that any criticism of the war policy of this administration, so far as my party is concerned, any suggestion of weakness or inefficiency in the conduct of the war voiced by any one of us from the beginning until now, has been made with one object, and one object only, the speeding up of the war. [Applause.]

There is only one issue in America to-day, my friends. It is the winning of the war and the winning of it speedily. To it all selfish considerations, all questions of partisan advantage, must bow. You of the majority party have control of the fighting machinery and the purse strings of the Nation. How can we of the minority best help you to make the men, the arms, and the money count. That is the only thing that concerns us. Can we best help by blindly following your leaders in every case, or can we best help by backing you to the limit when you are going in the right direction, but offering advice, suggestion, and criticism when you are going in the wrong direction or in no direction at all? That is the only problem we have, and I think there is but one answer. I hold that it is not only the privilege but the patriotic duty of Republicans in this hour, while backing the administration vigorously when it is right, to criticize it fearlessly when it is wrong. [Applause.] May I not, gentlemen, on this point quote from an article written by one of the best known men in America, probably one of the two or three leading Democrats in this Nation outside of public office? Mr. Henry Watterson, "Marse Henry," the veteran editor of the Courier-Journal, wrote an article which appeared in the Washington Post the other day. I will only quote very briefly from it. In speaking of what he called the "helter-skelter, ragtime press," meaning those papers which act as he describes them as "special pleaders for presidential policies," he said:

Here is a typical expression of the newspapers which having no opinions would deny them to all others. I find it in the Tennessean, of Nashville, and it reads as follows:

"Moses led the children of Israel 40 years in the wilderness because the Israelites had faith in Moses. When that faith waned for a moment Moses lost control of the Israelites. When faith was restored the people followed their leader. When their faith waned, calamity befell them. When they believed their leader, God smiled upon them, and they were cared for in that their every wish was granted. So must the American people place their faith in the Moses who is leading them out of the wilderness. Believe that Woodrow Wilson is our leader and that he knows the road to the promised land. Follow him with the faith of a child. Do his bidding in all things, and ours will be the victory."

Of these sentiments Col. Watterson said:

This is something worse than hero worship. It is fetish worship. After it servility could go no further. Fatuous, blind folly could offer no counsel more unpatriotic and unworthy. The writer forgets the free institutions of his country and proposes in lieu of them a cartel to Mexicanize the Government and Diazify the President. Except that the words have many echoes and appear to be a part of a cult organized, engineered, and dominated from Washington, they would not be important.

I do not believe there is a man in either House of Congress who in his heart of hearts will not admit the justice of Col. Watterson's characterization of that kind of flap doodle. If this is one of the many instances that continually crop out of little men trying to curry favor with a great one, then it is a matter of no importance at all; but if it is part of an organized cult to engineer and disseminate news from Washington, then it is a mighty serious thing. If there is here in Washington a publicity organization the purpose of which is to disseminate half truths, to tell only one side of the story, to exaggerate our successes and depreciate our failures, so that the people may be lulled into a false sense of security, then we have a source of real danger to the Republic. This is no time for half truths, my fellow countrymen. This is no time for concealment of the facts. If there ever was a time for pitiless publicity it is now. [Applause.] Whether it helps or hurts parties or individuals or presidential ambitions, the closed season for the truth ought to be declared off. This is not the President's war. It is not the war of the Democratic Party or any other party. It is the war of the American people. [Applause.] We stand by the President not as an individual, not as a party leader, but because he, for the time being, represents the American people. Our loyalty is pledged not a person but to the country and the cause. True patriotism in times like these should be evidenced not in mere empty professions of loyalty but in making that loyalty count in the actual winning of the war. [Applause.] Can that be best done by an attitude of fawning servility to those in the seats of the mighty or by constructive criticism of our shortcomings and suggestions of improvement? That is the question, and there ought to be but one answer. If the President in his magnificent isolation from the common people, an isolation among rulers comparable only to that of the Mikados of ancient Japan, is to be immune from criticism of his acts and the acts of his subordinates, then we must fight this war as no other war in history was ever successfully fought.

Criticism more bitter by far than that ever directed by anyone at this administration has been leveled at the responsible heads of other nations since the beginning of the war. Read the debates in the House of Commons and in the Chamber of Deputies and you will see what has been said here in criticism of this administration in comparison with what is being said there of their Governments is mild as the cooing of a dove. In England the personnel of the cabinet and the heads of the army and the navy have been changed time after time. In France seven ministries have fallen, and yet every change has brought an increased efficiency and power to the arms of the allies. Let us thank God for that. Were England's navy of less overwhelming power; were the armies of England and France on the west front less strong and efficient than they have become as the direct result of the criticism of weakness and inefficiency, it is not pleasant to think of the predicament in which we would find ourselves to-day.

At home criticism has not been partisan. It has come from members of both parties alike. The demand for investigation of certain executive departments has not been partisan. Upon the whole the result has been most salutary. Many improvements have been made, some grudgingly it is true, but all contributory to our fighting efficiency and strength. It has brought about the abolition of a good deal of red tape; it has done something toward a better coordination of overlapping powers, and it has in several instances resulted in the removal of incompetents and a substitution of strong and efficient men. These things have not come merely through the process of evolution. They are the direct result of criticism of weakness and inefficiency, and in their revealment through congressional investigation brought about, in most cases, by our insistence for light.

Will anybody say that we have been less patriotic than he who says, "I blind my eyes; I stop my ears; I have no opinions; I am abject; let Moses do it"? [Laughter.] In all that I have said, all that I shall say, I utter not a word of criticism of the general course of the Democratic Party in this House. I would be criticizing myself if I did, because your course on all war measures has been my course. I do not intend to offer any criticism to-day of the executive branch of the Government as administered by your party, but I insist that I not only have a right but that it is my duty as an American citizen to offer such criticism if it is intended or calculated to speed up the winning of the war. [Applause.]

I might most respectfully suggest, as my party has suggested, that much of the inefficiency and failure of the War Department to produce definite results is due to its various boards and committees, some with more and some with less authority, with conflicting power and jurisdiction and consequent chaos of administration, and that efficiency and order could best be had by the creation of a department of munitions and the coordination of all these overlapping functions under one head.

I have yet to hear a valid argument against it. Every argument for governmental inefficiency, conscious and unconscious, is in its favor. I doubt if you could sum up better in one sentence a more conclusive argument in favor of a munitions department than this. I quote:

I have a great respect for boards and commissions in peace times. I think they are very desirable. In war times I do not know of anything that is less desirable.

Those are not my words, gentlemen, they appear in the hearings on this bill before the Ways and Means Committee. They are the words of Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury. They might just as well, they might better have been, the words of Mr. Secretary Baker. But it all depends, even in times like this, whose ox is gored. This administration declines to accept directly our suggestions with regard to the creation of a department of munitions or other reforms in the general conduct of the war. They counter with the suggestion that some of these changes will probably be made if only we will give the President authority to remodel all departments. They are not satisfied with anything less than the Overman bill.

I repeat that this incessant reaching out for legislative functions on the part of the Executive, this inordinate greed of autocratic power, is a menace to the very foundations of our system of Government. We on this side of the aisle do not believe in it, and I am mighty sure that the great majority on that side of the aisle do not believe in it either.

We have played the game square with you since this emergency began, and we mean to keep on playing it square, that this war may end in honor and justice to the United States. [Applause.] You may make it a little harder for us by calling us names and impugning our motives, but you can not prevent us from supporting you to the limit on every measure designed to win the war. We believe that there are men in our party who could help to win if you gave them positions on the regular team instead of keeping them on the side lines. We think you would do better if you played the game the way our allies play it, where the question is not, Whom did you vote for in the last election? but, Are you fit to render service to your country in this time of need? [Applause.] It is not the question of whether a man calls himself a Democrat or a Republican that ought to count to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may I have three minutes more?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is not whether a man calls himself a Republican or a Democrat that ought to count, it is whether he is true blue American from his hide to the marrow of his bones. The true test of loyalty in these days lies not in mere empty protestations of devotion to the administration. It depends on whether with his body or his brains he is contributing something to the cause. Let us on both sides of this Chamber stand together on every measure which will help to win the war. Let us not play politics, let us not accuse each other of playing politics. It is a matter of mighty little importance whether the Democratic Party or the Republican Party shall control the next House of Representatives, except only in so far as that control may help or hinder the speedy winning of the war. [Applause.] If the next House shall be Republican, it will not be because we have played politics. It will be because the American people believe that the Republican Party is of all parties the best fitted to legislate to bring about efficiency, speed, and power in the conduct of the war and in the solution of the tremendous problems that lie before us in the period of reconstruction.

Just one more word, and I am through. These are days when the wisdom and truth of the saying of a great American statesman are especially apparent: "He serves his party best who serves his country best." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] such time as he may desire.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the speech of my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is but another evidence of the entire absence of partisanship in this House during the present war(?). I say that, provided you accept certain statements made by the gentleman protesting any disposition to inject politics into the affairs of Congress at this time. My view has been that each individual and each political party during periods of war should be permitted to raise political questions whenever he or they may see fit. They lose rather than gain by it. The country will judge individuals and parties and appraise their services by what they do in support of the war rather than by what they say of a political character while the war is pending. For my part, I have no disposition—I am really unable to warm up to any kind of a political speech during this serious and critical stage through which our country is passing. I feel, therefore, somewhat of a sympathy for any gentleman who can either get up and undertake to inject politics into our affairs—that is, for politics' sake—or who can find enthusiasm with which to applaud such utterances. This is especially true, Mr. Chairman, while we have under consideration one of the most important bills, one of the most far-reaching war measures that has been before Congress during the present war.

I had hoped that my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] would give the House the benefit of some of the splendid financial wisdom and the large storehouse of economic information which I know he possesses, and I remained on the floor very intensely listening, expecting to have the benefit of that kind of an address. I know that not only myself but the House was disappointed when we failed to hear the views of the gentleman with respect to the many extremely important provisions in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the problems with which this bill deals are closely related to and intimately associated with the great general problem of financing the war. The Government must provide in the soundest and most practical way for its daily cost. At the outset I desire to call attention to two important facts which relate to this bill. One is the general agreement among financiers and business men that the relief which this measure contemplates is both urgent and necessary. The other is that those who have withheld whole-hearted approval of the bill have failed to offer an adequate substitute remedy. The conditions which urgently call for financial relief by this or some similar special method are not common to this country alone. Similar emergency conditions have arisen and been dealt with under different plans in each of the important commercial countries at war.

It therefore becomes imperative, Mr. Chairman, that a new and additional method—an unusual kind of Government cooperation—should be devised to meet new and extraordinary conditions in this country resulting from the war. We should no more consider this method of rendering financial aid in time of peace, however, than we should refuse to consider it or some similar plan to meet unavoidable business necessities in time of war. There is no plainer proposition than that the financial resources of the country must be conserved and mobilized to the end that the entire financial power of the Nation shall be centralized behind the war. This embraces the conservation and mobilization of labor and all kinds of supplies, as well as money and credit. These are only secondary to the mobilization of the Army. Money is only the agency for securing these necessary supplies, both by paying labor to produce them and paying for them after they are produced. It is of interest to note that in all important countries at war both money and credit have been placed practically at the disposal of the Government. A similar course is imperative in this country in the interest of the prompt, vigorous, and comprehensive prosecution of the war. The effect of this preemption of money and credit by the Government will naturally be to deprive even that portion of our financial and industrial concerns whose continued and successful operation is likewise necessary for the conduct of the war, or is in the national interest, of a substantial amount of financial aid which they must have. Who, then, can and should see that they get necessary relief?

Mr. Chairman, it is well known that in time of war the activities and demands of businesses which contribute to its prosecution are greatly increased. The practical doubling of prices of commodities correspondingly increases their financial requirements. During normal times we have always done an immense credit business in this country. Business, however, has been able thus far to supply its financial needs from the public and from existing banking channels.

The Federal reserve banks, the national banks, the State banks, private banks, and the trust companies, together with the public, have at all times been ready and able to furnish ample credit for all business needs. The supply of money and credit heretofore available for investment, however, has now been channeled to a measurable extent—and must be more so as the war continues—toward the United States Treasury, through the agency of either taxes or bonds. While the banks will naturally undertake to assist their regular customers as heretofore, and the Federal Reserve System will in turn endeavor to accommodate the banks in these undertakings, it is entirely apparent that increased business activities will require additional credit not now available, and furthermore it is evident that even this character and amount of regular banking aid will not be sufficiently available to certain businesses and classes of business, the continued operation of which is essential, directly or indirectly, to the successful prosecution of the war—indirectly, or in the national interest. in the case of savings banks, for example, and directly in the case of war industrial concerns. Under existing law many of these businesses are denied financial aid through our Federal Reserve System, because Federal reserve banks are not allowed to rediscount paper, the proceeds of which have been used, or are to be used, for permanent or fixed investments of any kind, nor can they rediscount paper having a maturity of more than 90 days in most instances.

Mr. Chairman, these business concerns, as a rule, possess the most satisfactory securities for collateral, but the prohibitions just stated oblige them to turn to the public or to the other banks, which latter are now unable to furnish the necessary aid and at the same time retain liquid assets sufficient for their own soundness and stability; hence they must themselves turn to the Government or to some agency created by the Government for relief. Railroads, including all public utilities, individuals needing credit on long-term paper to buy war bonds, war industries which manufacture or produce supplies immediately required for war purposes, banks which have already furnished aid to these classes of business and industry to such an extent that they either require aid in turn or aid to enable them to continue thus to render financial assistance in their respective localities, present a new situation of credit requirement which must be provided for by some additional and unusual method. The situation and attitude of the Government, as I have described, is such that the duty of providing this new and independent source of credit by the best means possible devolves upon it, just as it has fallen on other Governments.

Mr. Chairman, the Treasury worked out the method deemed most desirable and practicable and embodied it in a draft of a bill which was sent to the chairmen of the appropriate committees of the respective Houses of Congress and by them introduced. That bill is now pending in modified form. It has been properly subjected to close scrutiny, both in and out of Congress. Both its plan and its purpose have received more or less criticism, some constructive and some destructive. The chief objection offered has related to inflation and to the possibly injurious effects the operation of the proposed corporation might have on our Federal Reserve System. Some critics appear to underestimate the necessity for the creation of this or a similar temporary and supplemental method of war financing. It is purely supplemental to our existing methods and facilities for supplying money and credit. In reply to the criticisms and objections offered, we do have the satisfaction of knowing that the method proposed by this bill is sounder, better, and more practicable than any similar method adopted for a like purpose by any of the other important countries at war.

It is proposed temporarily to weld, as it were, this method on our present national machinery of finance, with the purpose that it shall cooperate and articulate with existing financial agencies. Let us look at the principal objections offered against it, which are inflation and possible injury to the satisfactory operation of the Federal Reserve System—the fear that Federal reserve banks may become overstocked and "locked up" with so-called "dead securities," and that their notes might fall into disfavor.

As to inflation, it may be said that inflation would also arise if the financial aid necessary should be rendered by our regular banking agencies. This would be unavoidable in either event. As to fear of injury to the Federal Reserve System by allowing, under certain restrictions, rediscount and note-issue privileges to the bonds of the corporation, it may be said that this fear did not seriously arise when it was proposed to give similar privileges to our nearly $6,000,000,000 of war bonds, nor has such fear seriously arisen since they have been floated. The Federal Reserve System has been so carefully administered that only about $300,000,000 of this total issue has been allowed to come into the Federal reserve banks as collateral for advances for loans. The bonds of the corporation are not to be the direct basis of note issues. But, just as in the case of liberty-bond transactions, member banks could, under this bill, rediscount at Federal reserve banks their 15-day notes secured by short-term bond of the corporation, or the 90-day notes of their customers secured by such bonds. In other words, reserve banks can not buy them and issue notes against them as they would against bonds bearing the circulation privilege. Of course the reserve bank system will safely control the volume of discounts and note issues as they now do. They now have a 67 per cent gold cover for outstanding note issues.

Mr. Chairman, the successful flotation of the bonds of the corporation are virtually as necessary as the flotation of our war bonds, for the reason that the Government would otherwise be obliged to render financial aid, such as this bill proposes, out of the proceeds of war bonds. With the restrictions prescribed by this bill and others which the Federal Reserve Board is authorized to prescribe, I am unable to see any reason for fear that the Federal reserve organization, under its continued careful and safe administration, would suffer material injury from the operation of this corporation. This is especially true when we reflect that the general underlying theory of this bill is that no business or financial concern may invoke the aid of the corporation so long as it may be able to procure such aid from the public or regular banking sources on practicable terms. I am sure the affairs of the corporation will be administered in this spirit.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that the great desire of all banks during the war crisis is to keep their assets as liquid as possible. At each stockholders' meeting in England, France, and other countries the officials have pointed with pride to the manner in which they have during the year past maintained a sufficient level of assets that were liquid. All banks in this country feel the same way. They naturally desire to lend all financial aid possible through the handling of liquid assets, and such additional but limited aid as they may feel justified in offering upon long term and other paper which is good and solvent. The owners of large portions of the billions of long-term paper outstanding in this country are wholly unable, under existing conditions, to secure the necessary amount of credit on it either for the most urgent war business needs or for the purpose of investing in liberty bonds. The new method of finance proposed in this bill is intended, among other things, to give recognition to this class of paper to such an extent as may be deemed feasible and necessary.

The question of inflation of credits interposed against this bill is one of never-ending discussion and difference of opinion. Few people agree on the question as to when legitimate expansion ceases and injurious inflation begins. Still fewer people agree as to each of the causes and effects of inflation. Without stopping to enter into this ceaseless controversy, I may say that it is impossible for any country to finance a war such as the present one without more or less inflation. The evils of this necessary amount of inflation have in the past proven of less consequence and less insurmountable than the still greater evils that would otherwise have resulted. It has been made plain, if it was not already plain when we entered the war, that it could not be financed from taxation alone, which would have prevented inflation, nor from the added help of borrowing to the extent of the amount of savings and money available for investment, which also would have prevented hurtful inflation. It is claimed that legitimate borrowing would require the amount loaned to the Government to be matched by an equal amount of spending power relinquished by the people, and that to go beyond this means inflation. It therefore follows that inflation can be checked or prevented by savings on the part of the people and by restricting nonessential industries.

Mr. Chairman, the emasculation of the capital issues provision in this bill which would restrict nonessential industries is in this connection greatly to be deplored. I think it would be possible to finance the war on taxes and legitimate borrowing if the people could be induced to readjust their habits and industry speedily enough to conform to the great preparations for war which must immediately be made. Our annual savings should amount to $12,000,000,000 or $15,000,000,000. To the extent that our economic conditions are not so adjusted to war requirements the inflation complained of will probably arise in some form.

Credit, not currency, inflation threatens us most. While our stock of money on March 1, 1918, was $1,205,000,000 in excess of the stock on hand March 1, 1917, it must be noted that the increase of money in actual circulation was only $508,000,000. Both the $500,000,000 of gold turned in for Federal reserve notes and the notes themselves are embraced in the figures for 1918. This in a sense is duplication. It is said that to avoid inflation of currency, it can only be issued against gold or commodities; to issue it against nonproductive property, or commodities immediately destroyed or consumed would be inflation of currency. The needs of business and not the needs of the Treasury should always determine the amount of currency issued. While we point to the horrible condition of inflation in Europe as a situation entirely to be avoided at home, the fact should not be overlooked that they have banking credit inflation over there in connection with the purchase of Government bonds, while in this country the banks to-day only own a small percentage of Government long-term war paper, and the national banks only hold $280,000,000 of bonds of foreign Governments. The expansion of bank credit in aid of Government loans rather than bona fide borrowing from individuals is to be avoided to the fullest possible extent. The final question of paramount importance in this connection is, through taxation and legitimate loans, to transfer the spending power of the people to the Government to the extent necessary to meet its war obligations. This policy is very different from that possible one recently described by a leading financier as "a pyramid of credit based upon Government bonds and consisting first of individual credit, second of member-bank credit, and finally of reserve-bank credit, all backed by the taxing power and the power to issue money."

Mr. Chairman, to avoid the condition just described, the Government should encourage and in a measure require, if necessary, the people to contribute directly the maximum amount of their savings in money and production while the war continues. Naturally the demands of business and of the war justify a certain amount of expansion. The credit-lending and note-issuing power of the Federal reserve banks is still more than two billions. This will not be nearly exhausted in any event. Under the doctrine that a dollar of credit extended to member banks may be multiplied by five in the lending power of the member banks we have almost unlimited potential banking credit capacity. The first object, however, should be to avoid exercising it to the extent of inflation. This, as stated, can be effected best by saving and increasing production. Production of war supplies can be increased by curtailing nonessential industries and savings effected by putting a curb on personal expenditures. Such course would set free an immense amount of labor, tonnage, coal, and other materials strictly required for war purposes. The most effective means of curbing individual expenditure is by taxation. Taxation either prevents it or provides revenue for the Treasury. A good purpose is served in either event. Our existing war-tax laws go a considerable distance in restraining individual expenditures, but in view of the financial exigencies of the Government they do not go far enough. The immense amount of unnecessary, not to say entirely useless, private expenditures being made throughout the country is open and notorious. The income and excess-profits tax laws, which accomplish most in this respect, should, during the present session, have their rates readjusted and in some respects tightened up and a tax on sales of luxuries or a stamp tax on the order of that in France and certain other countries should be directly imposed on private expenditures for luxuries and other nonnecessities. A stamp tax on the receipt of money paid for diamonds, pearls, furs, and many other articles of ornament and luxury would be most timely. A special tax on gifts during the war would likewise serve a most useful end in more ways than one. Nothing is more vital than that these powers of useless expenditure should be transferred to the Government to the fullest possible extent to aid in meeting its sore financial needs. To this end the people of Europe are practicing all kinds of self-denial.

Mr. Chairman, after all is said, inflation, whether of currency or credit, tends to higher prices. Mr. Bonar Law, chancellor of the British exchequer, speaking in the House of Commons on January 29, 1918, relative to high prices of commodities, said:

> The inflation of prices is easy to explain. After the war broke out the supply of commodities was diminished. If there be any falling off in spending power—a reduction of wages—that supply would have been counteracted; but that could not happen. Wages were again raised to meet the increased prices, then prices rose once more and wages were again raised to meet the increased cost. The whole goes around indefinitely.

The bill would provide credits to meet real exigencies to the extent of $2,500,000,000, comprising its capital of $500,000,000 paid in by the Government, and bond issues of $2,000,000,000. Should absolute war-emergency demands require a larger amount now or hereafter, its lending power should be increased to a larger amount. In view of the special and emergency credit demands which must be met preferably by a new and supplemental method of finance, and in view of the Government's obligation and necessities in this connection, and in view of the safety and the practicability of the plan which this bill proposes, it is my judgment that it should pass and pass speedily, and that the Government at the same time should adopt every available resource to speed up production in all essential war lines and to compel savings on the part of the people by such effective means as taxation and reasonable restriction of nonessential industrial activities. We are in the midst of what is possibly a lengthy war. Our financial structure is sound. Our financial position is far stronger than that of any other country. The ablest banker in England, Sir Edward Holden, recently said:

I wish to congratulate the Federal Reserve Board and the bankers of America on having succeeded in creating and building up a banking system which surpasses in strength and excellence any other banking system in the world.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of great pride to note that the financial center of the world which was first at Tyre, then at Carthage, then at Rome, then at Venice, then at Amsterdam, then at London, is now in New York. We are the leading banking power of the world, with more than $3,000,000,000 of gold. We have a balance of trade in our favor of more than $3,000,000,000. Our large foreign loans are taken up by purchases from here. We do not have to borrow from abroad. Our purchases from abroad are not large. For three or four years following the war the balance of the world, largely famished and destitute, will be clamoring for each of our innumerable kinds of production. Why should our gold leave us within this period? We have become a great creditor Nation and will continue to be. Business conditions throughout the country are sound. While I would be as far as any person from urging a method of finance inherently unsound as a war measure, or one that would be calculated to injure or cripple our existing financial machinery, I do not overlook the fact that war in its very nature is more or less a test of the strength, the stability, and the staying power of the manhood, the industry, and the finances of the various nations engaged. Unusual exertion of man power, greater and more rapid production of industry, and increased credit facilities, are always required and always forthcoming. If this war is to be an unavoidable test of economic endurance, who is more ready to meet that test than the people of the United States? The financial institutions of European countries at war have successfully borne far heavier burdens than those of peace times or even those contemplated by the exigencies of war. I have confidence in the wise, careful, and sound administrative capacity of those at the head of our various banking institutions, and of those who will be at the head of the proposed corporation, and having that confidence in the proper administration of our banking affairs, I feel justified in the conclusion that the rediscount and note issuing privileges accorded to the bonds of this corporation in this bill would not be abused, but would, at the same time, both add great strength to the paper of this corporation and facilitate its successful operation to a large extent. No abler man has ever directed the affairs of the Treasury than Secretary McAdoo.

The operations of the Treasury and of this corporation should not so conflict as to handicap either. The paper of each, which contains like terms as to interest rates and maturity, should occupy a like position of advantage in the money market. The two should operate so as to reach most conveniently and with least conflict the various types of subscribers with cash available for loans, whether for short or long terms or intermediate periods.

Mr. Chairman, while we should prepare for and proceed upon the theory of a lengthy war, and while we do not in this country contemplate reaching the condition of financial stress under which other countries at war are to-day laboring, still it is a matter of special interest to glance at their financial methods adopted in large measure to meet conditions similar to those which this bill has in view. It will first be seen that the amount of money in the world has increased from $12,500,000,000 in 1912 to $32,500,000,000 at the close of 1917. We also find that the note circulation of the 11 European countries at war, over and above the specie reserve held against them, increased from $1,125,000,000 in 1914 to $13,640,000,000 in 1917. Russia, France, Germany, and Italy have been constantly increasing their uncovered paper circulation in the order named. The increase in the gold stock of the world has not been above normal. This expansion of currency, of course, is in addition to the huge expansion of banking credits.

Russia's methods of war finance have been reduced virtually to a printing-press proposition. Prior to the war the Russian State Bank had the authority to issue $230,000,000 of paper without gold cover. This limit has been enormously raised. Her entire paper money increased from $815,000,000 at the outbreak of the war to about $9,000,000,000 recenty. For some time the Government has been issuing unlimited quantities of paper, fresh from the printing press, and passing it out direct to all creditors in payment of her obligations.

At the outbreak of the war the limit on note circulation of the Bank of France was fixed by law at $2,400,000,000. At the time her outstanding note circulation was $1,436,000,000, whereas it is this year $4,725,000,000, or an increase of more than three and a quarter billions. The limit on its note circulation has been raised six times since 1914. The French Government, through its treasury and the banks, has rendered from time to time such emergency aid as this bill contemplates. The Bank of France at the close of 1917 had granted to the Government $3,000,000,000, had aided by subscriptions to the various Government loans, and had also made advances to many different firms by giving credit on securities offered. The Government cooperates with the bank with respect to these latter transactions and, in a measure, aids it in taking care of any losses incurred. The expansion of banking credit in France has been largely in the form of bank notes, which in the main have been put in government loans. This is true of Germany. In Canada a munitions board, to the extent required, finances all concerns producing war supplies by money procured from the treasury or by discounting British treasury bills and getting legal-tender notes.

Germany adopted a special method of financing not very unlike that proposed by this bill, except the German method is virtually a wide-open one, with no restrictions either on rediscounting by the German National Bank or on the note issues against the paper so rediscounted. On January 7, 1918, the note circulation of Germany aggregated $4,470,000,000, which was covered by $600,000,000 of gold. Germany has not maintained a gold standard since the outbreak of the war. Germany's ratio of gold to note issues was 25.4 per cent in 1914; 29.7 per cent in 1915; 22.4 per cent in 1916; and 14.9 per cent in October, 1917. This ratio has been considerably lowered since that time. The paper currency of Germany of all kinds has been increased from $500,000,000 at the beginning of the war to $4,500,000,000. Because of the fact that some of Germany's methods of financing the war are considered a greater departure from sound finance than those of some other countries, it would perhaps be of interest briefly to outline her method, which corresponds in a way with the plan of the pending bill, but without the restrictions and safeguards of the latter. At the outset Germany decided to finance her war on paper money and bonds. Her plan was to raise all the paper money required through the National Bank of Germany, known as the Reichsbank, but in case this method should prove insufficient she would utilize the loan banks. The Reichsbank makes loans by discounting bills in the main. Its note issues are covered only by bills so discounted and the cash balance. The amount of notes issued must never exceed three times the cash balance. The law thus fixes a limitation on the issue of notes. There is no legal limitation on the creation of credit balances. The bank was also required to meet the remaining two-thirds of note issues with bills of exchange falling due within 90 days. The treasury bill was not considered a bill of exchange for this purpose prior to the war. Soon after the war commenced, however, owing to the very great curtailment of the usual supply of bills of exchange, and finding it necessary that the Government should secure largely increased supplies of notes from the Reichsbank, the law was enacted in August, 1914, which defined treasury bills as coming within the class of bills of exchange to the extent that they could or should be utilized to cover note issues in all cases where there was a maturity within three months. The result was that the Government could issue treasury bills as rapidly and in amounts as great as it found necessary or saw fit, and the Reichsbank issued a corresponding amount of notes on the basis of these bills as they were needed.

Trouble, however, was found in keeping up the requisite amount of the cash balance, because of the limitation it imposed on note issues. This cash balance not only comprised silver and gold but notes of other banks, including also what were called Imperial Treasury notes. In August, 1914, a law was enacted creating another system of note-issue banks, which were known as the Darlehnskassen or loan banks. They were empowered to make loans by issuing notes. This loan-bank system was a revival of substantially the previous system of 1848 and the system of 1870 in operation during the Franco-Prussian war. The Reichsbank was authorized by law to include the notes of this latter class of loan banks in its cash balance, and also to treat them as gold, with the result that the Reichsbank could issue $3 of its notes for every $1 of Darlehnskassen notes held. It is represented that this loan-bank system which Germany has revived on the three occasions stated was to constitute an agency for making loans, which ought not to be made by the ordinary joint-stock or private banks in Germany. These loans were classified under the name of "dead loans." These Darlehnskassen banks make their loans to all kinds of business concerns, including municipalities, by the issue of Government notes to the extent of from 40 to 85 per cent of the value of the security offered. The purpose of the creation of these banks was to avoid the burdening of the Reichsbank and the joint-stock banks to an extent which would, to use the language of an English banker, "lock them up." The amount of notes issued by the Darlehnskassen banks was $329,000,000 for the year ending in December, 1914; $587,000,000 in December, 1915; $852,000,000 in December, 1916; and $1,922,000,000 for the year ending in December, 1917. For these same dates the Reichsbank used the following amounts to increase its cash balance: $217,000,000 for the year ending in December, 1914; $313,500,000 in December, 1915; $105,000,000 in December, 1916; and $326,000,000 for the year ending in December, 1917. These Darlehnskassen notes have been turned into the Reichsbank in payment of war loans to a very considerable extent for a time, but to a much smaller extent recently. Nearly 28 per cent of the first loan was thus paid. The States and municipalities have been heavy borrowers of these notes. Likewise individual concerns, including especially the manufacturers of munitions, savings banks, and many trading concerns, as borrowers have utilized these notes to a very great extent. With these Darlehnskassen notes included, the total issue of paper money of Germany in 1917 was $4,920,000,000. According to the balance sheet of the Reichsbank on December 31, 1917, the bank was utilizing as a cover for its note issues Darlehnskassen notes to the extent of $326,000,000 and treasury bills to the extent of $3,649,000,000.

It is thus seen that treasury bills were chiefly relied on. The Reichsbank notes, after being created in the manner already described, are utilized by joint-stock banks when received as a basis for the extension of further credit. The situation is that the Government is responsible to the bank on its treasury bills and the bank is responsible to the public on its notes. Since August, 1914, the Reichsbank has by law been relieved of its previous obligations to repay its notes in gold. It may further be remarked that the Government discounts its treasury bills with the Reichsbank at the official rate, while the Reichsbank rediscounts the bills in the open market at the market rate, which is always lower than the official rate. It is noted that the German law prescribes a ratio of the cash balance to the notes issued and not to the liabilities, which would also include credit balances. These Darlehnskassen banks are controlled by the Reichsbank. The banks commenced business without capital, but with only note issues. According to the recent announcement of the president of the Reichsbank the German Government contemplates the continuance of these loan banks for a period of four or five years after the war for the purpose of giving persons time in which to repay money borrowed to purchase Government bonds and also to extend credit to other banks which are expected to be in need of help in meeting conditions that will arise after the war. He expresses the view that holders of war loan bonds will to a very great extent seek to part with their holdings in order to secure money to invest in raw materials, factories, and other business concerns at the conclusion of the war, and that this will throw a large portion of the war loan on the market without sufficient buyers, which would result in the depreciation both of the bonds and the securities in general. This plan, however, contemplates a combined plan of joint activities on the part of the Reichsbank and the joint-stock banks and the Darlehnskassen, the idea being that the Darlehnskassen and to some extent the Reichsbank will provide new capital for the absorption of war loans, and in turn the Reichsbank and branches acting in cooperation with the joint-stock banks and their branches will take up the securities whenever offered for sale and thus protect the security market. The securities so taken up would thus gradually be redistributed during a number of years to follow through the agencies of the Reichsbank and the joint-stock banks.

The foregoing would indicate that the German Government entertains the view that it will be impossible to effect a large withdrawal of any of their notes by these special war banks in a shorter time than four or five years. I am unable to secure any data as to the amount of paper issued by ordinary banks in Germany. I have procured this information relative to these German loan banks chiefly from English financial publications and from a recent financial address of Sir Edward Holden.

Mr. Chairman, the second report of the select committee on national expenditures in England contains this statement:

> The Government through the Bank of England and joint-stock banks created large new credits to enable its factories to expand their productions.

The English banking system only provides credit and not currency. When the war broke out in 1914 gold was rapidly withdrawn and additional currency became necessary. The result was that the original act of 1844 imposing legal restrictions on the issue of notes by the Bank of England had to be suspended so that the bank could exceed the legal limit of its note issue, which was accordingly done on a large scale. This was the fourth time in the history of this banking act that the law had to be suspended to meet financial emergencies.

Under the currency and bank notes act of August 6, 1914, the treasury was authorized to issue currency notes through the Bank of England to bankers to a maximum limit not exceeding 20 per cent of the bank's liabilities on deposit and current accounts. The amount of notes thus issued are treated as an advance by the treasury to the bank or banks, bearing interest from day to day at the current bank rate, the security for the treasury advance consisting of the floating charge on the assets of the bank up to the amount of the notes issued.

This same act authorized the Bank of England and any Scottish or Irish bank of issue, so far as temporarily authorized by the treasury and subject to any conditions attached to that authority, to issue notes in excess of any limit fixed by law. These notes, like currency notes, to be legal tender and redeemable in any kind of coin. The Scottish and Irish banks of issue used currency notes as cover for the bank's own notes. Their excess issues of their own notes could not exceed the cover afforded by the currency notes.

During the early stages of the war the English Government made special provision for advances in connection with stock-exchange loans. These advances were to be made through the Bank of England, not to banks but direct to other lenders to members of the stock exchange. These advances were to the extent of 60 per cent of the value of the securities held by such lenders.

The British treasury in November, 1914, organized a committee representing the treasury, the Bank of England, the joint-stock banks, and the Association of Chambers of Commerce, which authorized advances in approved cases to British traders carrying on an export business. When an application for advances was approved, this committee authorized the bankers of such trader to accept a six-months' bill drawn by the trader. This bill was renewable until 12 months after the close of the war or the expiration of the act. The trader could discount this bill anywhere. The Government provided that as to any loss in connection with these advances 75 per cent should be borne by the treasury and 25 per cent by the accepting bank. The cost to the trade was about 6½ per cent per annum.

The Government, in November, 1914, jointly agreed with the Liverpool Cotton Association and the Liverpool banks to guarantee advances made to merchants by those banks. Under this plan persons desiring advances made application to representatives of the cotton association and the banks of Liverpool. The chief purpose of this direct aid was to enable the Liverpool Cotton Exchange to reopen.

It will be seen that the English methods adopted for affording financial relief to different classes of business have been less satisfactory than the proposed method. Moreover, they have had such drastic experience as the moratorium. Sir Edward Holden recently stated that—

> If the act (restricting the amount of note issues of the Bank of England) had been repealed, I believe that we might have got through the crisis without a moratorium.

England has made considerable expansion of banking notes, silver and copper circulation, in addition to more than $1,000,000,000 of new paper currency notes, which latter are declared redeemable in coin, although the actual reserve for that purpose is only $147,500,000 of gold. She had only $140,000,000 of these latter notes outstanding in December, 1914. It is thus seen that while England continues nominally on a gold basis, she is not so in actual fact. It is important, however, to note that her financial structure continues stable and there is no lack of parity between gold and other kinds of circulating medium. A movement is now on foot to secure the repeal or modification of the Bank of England act of 1844 so that the bank will be allowed to exceed the limit of its note issue at any time on payment of a tax. The amendment embodies the principles that notes may be created and issued on the security of bills of exchange and on the cash balance, so that a relation is established between the notes issued and the discount; the notes issued shall be controlled by a fixed ratio of gold to notes or of the cash balance to notes; this fixed ratio may be lowered on payment of a tax; and the notes should not exceed three times the gold or the cash balance. The fact that the Bank of England is divided by law into two parts—the issue department and the banking department—makes the statement of the bank for January 16, 1918, for example, show a percentage of gold alone to liabilities of 19.6 per cent, but in fact the bank's entire amount of available gold was 28.2 per cent of liabilities. The Bank of England has always been allowed to issue notes against a debt due from the Government for several centuries of the amount of $55,000,000 and certain securities of $37,000,000. All other notes must be issued against gold. With these three items forming the cash balance of the bank under its statement of January 16, 1918, the percentage to liabilities was in fact 33.5 per cent against 19.6 apparently shown by that statement.

The entire note issue of England during the war increased from $225,000,000 to $1,385,000,000. Much of the latter, however, was issued for gold withdrawn from circulation. During the early stages of the war the British Treasury assisted many financial institutions by issuing through the Bank of England currency notes to banks under certain conditions and restrictions. It will be seen that financial aid has been rendered businesses and classes of business at various times and in various ways, both by the British Treasury and by the banks in turn. Some time ago the leading banks made an arrangement whereby credit facilities were allowed the farmers to enable them to purchase the requirements necessary for greater food production. Some recent financial aid the British Treasury has rendered has embraced such direct advances as the bonus to potato growers, $25,000,000; bonus to miners, $100,000,000; bonus to munition workers, $200,000,000; loaf subsidies to make the price 18 cents for 4-pound loaves, $225,000,000; bonus to railway workers, $50,000,000; bonus to civil servants, $15,000,000.

In addition to her increased bank and treasury notes, England takes care of a floating debt of around $6,000,000,000. Of late England has striven to avoid investment by banks in long-term war bonds. The banks are reported to have contributed $500,000,000 of the first long-term 3½ per cent loan, amounting to $1,666,000,000; $1,000,000,000 of the second 4½ per cent long-term loan, amounting to $2,915,000,000; and no substantial direct contribution to the third long-term loan of February, 1917, at 4 and 5 per cent. In the United States the banks, as stated, have very greatly reduced their holdings of long-term war securities.

Mr. Chairman, it will be seen from the brief references made to the methods of financing adopted by other countries during the war that the contrast in favor of those of the United States is as great as it is favorable. One of the chief purposes of the proposed corporation is to render such emergency financial aid as the Treasury would in most instances undertake to render for war purposes or in the national interest, but which it can not render in a manner nearly so convenient and expeditious as the corporation, which, after all, is but a Government agency with limited liabilities.

While savings banks are referred to as possibly needing immediate credit facilities from time to time during the war, the mere fact that such facilities are thus made available in case of need will probably obviate any necessity for advances to them. The experience of savings institutions elsewhere where the financial stress confronting them has been greater than that which will arise here confirms this view.

The English postal savings deposits at the beginning of the war were $940,000,000, while on February 2, 1918, they were $1,015,000,000. The only other kind of savings banks in England, known as trustee savings banks, have only suffered a loss of deposits to the amount of $12,500,000. The English postal savings rates have been 2½ per cent from the beginning, as compared with rival offerings for half a dozen different kinds of Government war paper, running as high as 6 per cent at times for exchequer bonds. Only about $90,000,000 were withdrawn from this latter class of savings institutions during the $5,000,000,000 loan campaign in February, 1917, while $120,000,000 were withdrawn during the 4½ per cent loan campaign in 1915. It is evident that any advances our savings institutions might require from the corporation would be very temporary and during some large loan campaign. Deposits in German savings banks during the first 11 months of 1917 were $825,000,000 gross, as compared with $575,000,000 for 1916 and $580,000,000 for 1915. Germany has floated a long-term issue of bonds every six months during the war. In Italy the savings banks deposits increased from $397,000,000 on July 1, 1916, to $507,000,000 on October 21, 1917.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the committee the benefit of his research as to how that difficulty was met by the savings banks of the country when the last liberty loan was floated, caused by the withdrawal of savings funds on the part of depositors from savings banks?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman it has been difficult to get accurate figures as to the savings withdrawals in this country during the last liberty loan. It has been suggested by those in the savings-bank sections that substantial withdrawals occurred, but no exact figures have been obtainable. Now, in that connection, I call attention to the figures showing the rather satisfactory operation of the savings institutions in England, Germany, and two or three other countries during the war. In Germany, where there have been seven successive long-term loans, in England, where there have been three, in Canada, where there have been several, and in Italy, where there have been about five, the figures which I will not take time to read but will insert in the RECORD, show that there has been an annual uniform increase in savings deposits under these loan conditions.

Now, it is true that there have been temporary withdrawals, but they have been only temporary. The withdrawals from the postal savings system in England, which is the main portion of the savings institutions, only amounted to $210,000,000 during both the largest loan campaigns, as I have stated, and the amount was soon replenished. So I feel assured that the mere fact that the savings institutions of the country have available credit for depositors will be practically sufficient to safeguard them against serious withdrawals; and, if the gentleman will pardon me, I say that in the light of the experience of the other countries.

The rate of interest in the English postal savings banks is 2½ per cent. It has never been over that, and yet the Government has been paying interest all the way from 3½ to 6 per cent on the various kinds of war paper it has put out.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the gentleman if the withdrawals from the savings banks in this country during the bond sale injured the savings banks at all?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I was unable to find any facts or data which indicated serious injury, or inconvenience, or possible injury to them during these past loans. But I agree with gentlemen from these savings-bank sections that the banks are entitled to the benefit of immediate credit facilities to meet any possible withdrawals to such surprising extent as might or could occur during these bond campaigns, or at any other time, as to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have received definite information that in some sections of the country there were withdrawals of savings funds to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and my query directed to the gentleman from Tennessee was as to how the savings banks met the stringency occasioned by the withdrawal of those savings funds.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I do not think the stringency was great enough to necessitate any unusual preparation by the savings banks with a view of securing available funds to meet withdrawal demands. In other words, no such stringency has occurred as might occur under the next loan campaign or some successive loan campaign; and it is but natural that they should expect and that they should receive at the hands of the Government such available assistance as possible conditions might make necessary.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I would like to state, and I do not know whether I remember it correctly or not, that my recollection is that this very question was asked of the Secretary of the Treasury and he said the withdrawals had not heretofore been substantial, and, of course, expressed the hope that they would not be substantial under the next liberty loan. That is my recollection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I agree that that is substantially what the Secretary said, and I think it will work out largely that way, in the light of European experience.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, that danger would be particularly evident if the next large bond issue should be at a higher rate than 4 per cent.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The possibilities of danger would correspondingly increase.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will permit, the savings banks statistics of the State of New York, which State, perhaps, has larger deposits than any other State, have been published in the last week, I believe, and show that the withdrawals from the savings banks, while greater than the deposits during the past year, were offset by interest credits during the last year. If another liberty loan campaign is waged on a 4½ per cent basis some kind of relief will very likely be necessary.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is a very interesting statement. I am glad the gentleman made it.

Mr. KITCHIN. In that connection I desire to say that while other banks, not mutual savings banks, have increased their individual deposits nearly 50 per cent in the last three years, the mutual savings banks have increased their deposits only about 12 per cent. In other words, the deposits in savings banks in the last 12 months especially has not kept pace with anything like the increase in the deposits in other banks, which shows that something is affecting the savings banks. Now, in June, 1914, the deposits in mutual savings banks—which constitute three-fourths, at least, of all the deposits in the savings banks—were $3,915,626,000. In June, 1917, they had only increased since 1914 to $4,422,489,000. In other words, they had only increased about $500,000,000, and in the stock savings banks their deposits have increased since June 20, 1914, to June 20, 1917, less than $100,000,000. In fact, they were about $1,000,000,000 on June 20, 1917, so that something has materially affected the deposits of savings banks. While other banks seem to have been helped, the savings banks seem not to have been helped by any of this war prosperity, you might say.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will permit, would not that tend to show that the wage earners and the smaller merchants, who constitute the bulk of the depositors in the mutual and in the stock-savings banks, have not had as much chance to save as they had before? The deposits in the national banks are made up of credits or loans, but in the savings banks they are largely cash.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that in the last 12 months they have had opportunity to make Government investments; that is, they could buy Government bonds and get 4 per cent interest. That is all. They could get, as a rule, less than that in the savings banks that pay the highest rate of interest. So instead of putting their money in the savings banks they have invested in Government securities.

Mr. PLATT. That is probably true of the last few months, but it would not have been true of the 3½ per cent loans.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can see how it would be true as to that, because most of the savings banks do not pay more than 3 per cent interest. What rate do they pay in the State of New York?

Mr. PLATT. The larger savings banks in New York City pay only 3½ per cent, but in the smaller cities they generally pay 4 per cent.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is very apparent that every country at war has had to grapple with problems similar to those to which this bill refers. It is also apparent that the methods by which they undertook to extend relief are not, in soundness and practical operation, nearly so meritorious as the methods proposed in this bill.

I now come to another branch of the bill relating to capital issues. With due deference to the committee—and I always have the profoundest respect for the views and judgment of the Committee on Ways and Means—it is my humble opinion that the capital issues provision as originally inserted in this bill should not have been weakened. It is most unfortunate that the House committee and the Senate have seen fit to emasculate the provision in the bill authorizing restrictions of capital issues. The necessity for this action is grounded upon the whole financial policy of the Government placed in operation for the conduct of the war and is an essential part of the same. It is not only based on the experience of all other important countries at war, but it is a fundamental part of the Government's policy of conserving all possible money, credit, labor, and supplies and concentrating them directly behind the war, as it is also directly an essential part of our Government's loan policy. Offerings of new securities for other than Government or necessary war purposes have been practically suspended everywhere except in the United States.

The real demands of the war relate to the securing of goods and services for war purposes. It follows as day follows night that nonessential industries should not, therefore, expand but that all available labor, materials, and capital above their normal requirements should be diverted to war purposes. The greater the amount of money thus made available for investment the easier can Government loans be floated and the lower will be the interest charges. It is a well-known fact that most of the industries in Austria, Turkey, and Germany not directly connected with the war are either crippled or destroyed. The people are putting their all into the war. Many nonessential industries there have been diverted to war purposes; others have been obliged either to run at a normal or less than normal capacity or to close down. During the year 1917 in Germany the increase in capital for existing companies and issue of shares by new companies only aggregated $105,000,000. Twenty-five million dollars of this amount was due to increase in capital by aniline concerns in November. New capital issues in England for the year 1917, apart from Government issues, were between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000. It was about the same for 1916. This was less than one-half of 1 per cent of the total, the balance of which was Government issue. No expenditures on new buildings in excess of $2,500 is allowed there without permission of the treasury. In the beginning of capital issues control in England the officials undertook to halt all construction work involving new capital expenditures until after the war, except for war purposes. The Government has even compensated contractors for damages resulting from a cessation of such construction work. Our original bill allowed an exemption of $100,000. Prior to the war the issues of new capital in England were more than $1,100,000,000, whereas under strict Government regulations the amount is now but little over $30,000,000, making a net saving of toward $1,000,000,000 to go into war bonds and the production of war supplies. Under like restrictions here the Government would derive far more than $1,000,000,000 for direct war purposes. Little wonder money and material for the war are scarce, with interest rates increasing.

Mr. Chairman, it is claimed here in support of the view that all nonessential industries and businesses should be allowed to expand and produce war profits ad libitum that the persuasive influence of the proposed capital issues committee will curb them sufficiently. England is cited as having no general express law for this purpose. The truth is that England has a number of statutes expressly authorizing the prohibition of new capital issues as to certain classes of industry, while the power of the treasury to control the stock exchange gives the treasury committee authority equivalent to that of law as to other new capital issues. It has been by these combined means, and only by them, that suitable restrictions have been imposed and carried out in England.

The absolute folly of depending on nonessential industries to observe the persuasive suggestions of a capital-issues board with no authority is better illustrated by the experience of Canada, whose committee was acting under an order in council, which was a law. The law there prohibited either the selling or purchasing of prohibited securities and imposed a penalty of imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, in the discretion of the court. In the face of this severe penalty large blocks of new securities were issued and sold without the necessary approval of the committee, with the result that the Government on January 9, 1918, issued another order in council allowing the committee, in certain cases, to give its approval after the issue and sale of such issues in order to save the violators from the penalties incurred. This related to meritorious cases alone. Criticism of the penalty contained in the first draft of this bill for violation of these security restrictions has been made. The laws of France, Germany, and Canada impose penalties equally effective or more so. I herewith append copies of the laws of four other Governments on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, just now the Government is strenuously calling on every citizen to produce and to save. The cry "Produce, save, restrict, or eliminate nonessentials!" is to-day ringing through every European country. The Government must have all available supplies of every kind necessary for the conduct of the war. It is just as necessary, therefore, that money and credit should be conserved, concentrated, and made available to the Government with which to pay for needed war supplies, as it is that they should be produced and made available for the Government's use. Upon what theory, therefore, can the Government call on one class of citizens to save all the money and produce all the war supplies possible and place both at its disposal, while it at the same time leaves another class of citizens free to utilize any amount of new capital or labor or material, so vital to our war necessities, in developing all nonessential industries and turning out large war profits to their own enrichment? When we behold the central powers marshaling their entire financial and economic forces behind the war to the practical abandonment of nonessential enterprises; when we see our allies in Europe doing virtually the same thing, with a view to putting every ounce of material, every hour of labor, every dollar of money that can be made at all available in compact, concentrated support of the war, how can we in justice to our allies, much less to ourselves, proceed with indifference as to the hundreds of millions of money, the immense amount of labor, and the large quantities of material unnecessarily retained for the development and expansion of nonessential businesses to the great detriment of our war supplies, our labor necessities in shipbuilding, and other war-industry plants, and to our money and credit supply so necessary for the floating of large temporary and permanent loans? I fear that we do not yet realize the magnitude of our task. I fear that there is too much disposition to expect others to perform such additional war services, at whatever cost or injury, as would involve some sacrifice or disappointment to those who should perform them.

Naturally, the policy of controlling new capital issues during the war will involve injuries to a business or class of business here and there, but it may be said that this would be infinitesimal to the overwhelming injury that would result to all classes of business and to our institutions as well in case we should unduly protract or fail to win the war by our deliberate refusal to organize, conserve, and mobilize our money, credit, and supplies to that full extent which both our enemies and our allies have already done. Every good citizen should be ready and willing to conform to the necessary restrictions of new capital issues. The law, with its penalties, would not disturb him; every shirking citizen should be compelled to conform to them, and to that end the law should disturb him. Who has a right, therefore, in the interest alone of the business concern that would shirk its duty and violate these regulations, to demand immunity for it? The citizen can not learn too soon the necessity for giving more of his time and money to the Government and less to his own enrichment if we are to win this war.

Mr. Chairman, the pending bill also authorizes the corporation to buy and sell bonds of the United States. It is understood that the chief purpose of this provision is to enable the corporation to make such purchases of outstanding war bonds and at such times as would tend to stabilize the Government loans. I am gratified to see this principle embodied in the bill. It was my individual view that the bond-authorization act of September 24, 1917, should have contained it. Under the operation of such plan I am satisfied the present market situation of our liberty bonds would have to-day been much more favorable than it is. I speak in the light of the experience of both England and France during the past year. The only purpose of this method is to protect liberty bonds from artificial market conditions and to maintain them at their true and real market level, whether in the condition of the investment market that be par or slightly below par. Naturally, many individuals purchased bonds on credit procured at the banks. During recent months a large number have found themselves unable to make payment, with the result that their bonds went on the market at forced sale and at a discount, the inevitable effect of which has been apparently to depreciate the entire issue of first and second liberty 4's, aggregating near $4,500,000,000. This unfortunate condition now confronts the Government in the face of a new long-term loan which must soon be effected. The result is that higher interest rates are being generally demanded. Fair and reasonable rates of interest should be paid by the Government on its war loans, but the greatest possible care and caution should be exercised, to the end that excessive rates and the great burdens which they would entail on this and the next generation may be avoided. It is well understood that a system of successive war loans carrying a conversion privilege in each case very seriously hampers the Government in its efforts to keep the interest rates at the proper and fair level.

I wish to repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the action of the capital-issues committee in England has all the force and effect of law. It is impossible, under the power which they exercise through agencies which really are as effective as law, for any concern to put new issues on the market in violation of their order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman entirely on that. In England it is done by the force of a treasury regulation, as the gentleman is of course aware, and by this treasury regulation they undertake to absolutely forbid such issues as they do not approve, and I think they have succeeded quite completely in enforcing the regulation.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I am appending the laws of four countries to my remarks.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I add right there, is not the Government control of the stock exchange complete?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The treasury have complete control of the opening and closing of the exchange, and they would not allow it to be opened after it was closed during the early stages of the war, except on condition that no stock should be handled unless permission was first secured from the capital-issues committee.

Then they have two or three separate statutes which expressly give authority to prohibit stock issues as to certain other classes of capital.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman is a student of economics. I wonder if he could go a little more into detail into the question of nonessential industries? For instance, England apparently has not discouraged, and perhaps has encouraged certain industries which are not in any way essential to the war, but which are exporting industries. So her exports have been kept up pretty well. Is not that true?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Some of her exports have been kept up, but she has a balance of trade against her now of $2,300,000,000, notwithstanding such volume of exports as she has been able to maintain.

Mr. PLATT. There has not been an effort to shut out industries which are not indirectly connected with the war, though, if they were industries which brought credit to England and extended or maintained her export trade.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am sure he will find, as I have stated, that they have not only imposed severe restrictions on new capital issues for nonessential purposes, but they went at once to every contractor constructing an important building and said, "We ask you to cease this construction until after the war." In many cases the contractors did this; in others they declined on account of the damage involved; and the Government said, "We will pay the damage. We want your new capital, your labor, and your materials to put into the war."

Mr. PLATT. They did not undertake to hold down industries from going ahead as they were, without extra buildings or extra capital, did they?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. In some instances they have so well restricted and curtailed the operation of large parts of their nonessential industries as practically to put them out of business. They openly say that somebody will have to suffer, somebody will have to make some sacrifices in connection with the general plan of the Government to mobilize all available money and credit and labor and supplies for the prosecution of the war. We do not expect our nonessential industries to go full tilt, expanding, as the war goes on, and make increased profits at the expense of the war.

Mr. PLATT. What they did practically was to stop their expansion.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. They stopped their expansion and largely denuded them of labor and supplies. The Government put its hands on the raw material at the source and they were soon cut off, and the Government made no effort to help them. It was too busy with the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As our bill was first presented to the House it was intended to comprehend that sort of a compulsory feature here?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must hasten along.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois and Mr. FOCHT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will yield to these two gentlemen, and then I just must conclude.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I conclude that the gentleman thinks this law ought to provide somewhere the power to prohibit the issue of stocks. Now, as I remember, it was repeated before the committee that there was already in operation through the Secretary of the Treasury a voluntary committee, who are acting in substantially the same capacity that this committee will act. Was it not represented to the committee that they were fairly successful and were preventing the issue of unnecessary stocks?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The Secretary of the Treasury stated that they had made considerable progress in that class of work. When I looked into the experience over in Canada, however, where a similar penalty was imposed, and found so many different classes of new stock issues put on the market in utter defiance of the existence of the committee and the penalties, and when I reflected further as to the innumerable kinds of industry in this country compared with the smaller number in Canada, it was impossible to escape the conclusion that immense amounts of new capital—it may be of a comparatively small nature in many cases—will be further utilized in these nonessential lines, with the result that a vast amount of money in the aggregate would be lost to the Government in connection with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I got the impression, if not the conviction, that the Secretary of the Treasury, through the banks, could make it practically impossible for any very great issue of bonds to be made that even this voluntary committee disapproves of.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. True as to very great new issues. There will be so many smaller ones that will ignore the committee.

All of such nonessential investments, all of such purchases keep that amount out of shipbuilding, keep it out of all classes of war industry, and you will greatly hamper the strength and capacity of the Government to finance the war at a reasonable rate of interest in the first place, and in the second place it is deprived, as stated, of the labor and materials that would otherwise be available.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman from New York referred a moment ago to the industrial activity of England. I assume that the method employed, or a similar one proposed here has something to do with stimulation of that activity. I was advised, much to my surprise, by a gentleman who knows as much about shipping as any person in the country that the exports from England are now greater than they were prior to the war. I would like to have the gentleman, if he has any such information, confirm it.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The chief concern with warring countries in the examination of imports and exports now is to see where the balance of trade is.

Mr. FOCHT. That would have no result in the amount of exports prior to the war and at the present time. They might have much more imports than they had before and still greater exports.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If the gentleman takes that question up, he is obliged to go back and allow for the increased values over the value of imports and exports before the war. You may find that the exports are now double in value those before the war, but if you look at the quantity you may find that they are less than they were before the war. It requires an investigation at the different stages as to the actual relative quantity and value.

Mr. FOCHT. I was hopeful to find through the methods here a possibility of the same stimulation that they have had there because of the increased capital and the flexibility of the whole financial situation.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I see the gentleman's point now, and it is a good one.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this Government can adopt the stabilizing method proposed in this bill, and I am not criticizing this method, but I am only urging that it should have been supplemented by the English and French methods.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of the Treasury did not approve the setting aside of a sinking fund or the retention of the bonds at par, as I recall it.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is advocating the French method, and I thought it was fair to the committee to say that the Secretary did not approve the adoption of this method.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is true, but I hope to persuade the Secretary that he ought soon to recommend it, and I say that for this additional reason. We have been preaching over this country that persons should purchase Liberty bonds and should not sell them; that the market ought not to be loaded and oppressed with sales when once purchased, whereas in this corporation bill we make one prime function of that corporation, to buy and sell bonds in order to stabilize the market.

Mr. Chairman, as to interest rates, should the war go on for some time, as it bids fair to do, we will later see a general demand arise for higher rates of interest on the loan to follow the coming one. I wish to say something on this subject presently. Some persons say that a stabilizing method creates artificial interest conditions. On the contrary, it would remove or prevent an artificial interest and capital value situation created by the forced sales of a very small percentage of the total volume of bonds outstanding. England set aside each month one-eighth of 1 per cent of the total issue under her last long-term loan, which included $5,000,000,000 of new money and about $5,000,000,000 of conversions, for the purchase of these bonds in the market when they went below par. During the past 12 months she has expended near $140,000,000 in this manner—$150,000,000 has been set aside—with the result that the fours have been at or above par most of the time, while the 5½ per cents, subject to all income tax, have either been kept at or near enough to par as to create no injurious effects on her temporary or forthcoming long-term loans. France has utilized almost the identical method, and it continues in operation without criticism.

The best judgment of the Government and of financiers in England and France has supported this method as the most effective means of stabilizing their respective Government loans. Those Governments could have adopted the method proposed in this bill or any one of several others, but they still cling to the plan which I have described, and experience has seemingly justified its wisdom and practicability. My individual judgment is that this bill should contain the provision now in it and also the English and French plan. It is obvious that with the forthcoming loan the amount of outstanding bonds will at least reach $10,000,000,000. From experience abroad, it will be necessary to purchase $150,000,000 annually for stabilizing purposes. The new corporation, I fear, will be too much engrossed in making advances in other directions, with the result that these preemptions of its resources will leave an inadequate amount with which to buy war bonds on the market and stabilize our loans. Combined with this additional method which I have described the corporation would then be in an attitude merely of supplementing the purchases of the Treasury to such extent as might be deemed wise and necessary for stabilizing purposes. This combined plan would save considerable interest. The English method operates as a sinking-fund proposition to the extent of the bonds purchased.

Mr. Chairman, referring again to our rising interest rates, I think it would be unwise to insert another conversion clause in the forthcoming long-term bonds. To continue to do so would result in swinging the entire volume of outstanding war debt to the highest interest level that will be reached during the course of the war. One may say that we could then refund into lower rates of interest in the course of some five year after the war. The answer to this is that no government will be able to refund twenty or thirty billion dollars within any short time at that stage. We might greatly profit here by the course and example of the English Government in dealing with a gradual and certain rising of interest rates at each successive loan stage. Her first long-term loan was floated in 1914 at 3½ per cent; her second in 1915 at 4½ per cent; during the latter part of 1916 the Government was being forced to pay 5½ per cent on treasury bills of 12 months or less and 6 per cent on exchequer bonds of three years. The necessity for another large long-term loan to absorb some of the floating indebtedness and to secure new money confronted the Government. There was a general clamor for higher interest rates on the new loan and suggestions upon every hand that it would have to bear around 6 per cent interest. This outcome was seemingly inevitable. A new ministry came into power, however, in the meantime.

The new treasury officials decided that the Government would take a hand in shaping the course of the money market. They at once announced a discontinuance of the issue of any more short-term paper at 5½ per cent and 6 per cent. They prepared a prospectus of the new loan. This proposed two interest rates, in the alternative—one rate was about 5¼ per cent subject to all income tax; the other rate was determined by subtracting from this higher rate the existing normal income tax rates, which fixed it at 4 per cent "with normal income tax compounded," but subject to supertax. The supertax rates then, as now, ranged as high as 42½ per cent. The loan campaign which followed in February was an immense success and the flotation of this loan at these rates is still pointed to as a great achievement of the Government. To-day the English 4's subject to supertax are at a premium, while ours are under 97. Since that time English Government borrowing and disbursements have been the chief influence in the money market, and discount rates have been following the rates at which treasury bills were to be had. When the sale of three-month treasury bills at 5½ per cent was suspended in January, 1917, their market at once fell to 5 per cent. At the end of April weekly sales of three-month treasury bills at 4⅜ per cent were inaugurated. On December 27 the rate for three and six month treasury bills was lowered to 4 per cent, and this brought down discount rates correspondingly. During the fore part of the present year three and six month treasury bills were sold as low as 3½ per cent, while bank-deposit rates went to 3 per cent. It may be contended that the loans made to England by this Government made these interest reductions possible. Perhaps a suitable reply would be that England has during this time been obliged to take care of an unfavorable trade balance of $2,300,000,000; she has been obliged to maintain her international exchange situation, which required the payment of a separate and higher interest rate than her domestic rates; she has during the past year loaned her dominions and allies $2,000,000,000; she has also been struggling along under the burden of $24,000,000,000 indebtedness. It is also true that England did not float a large amount of bonds abroad during 1917.

Then, Mr. Chairman, why should not our Government, as the chief factor in our money market, which it is, exercise its influence to the extent consistent with our domestic conditions, with a view to stabilizing the money market and keeping our interest level, not below a legitimate plane that would be fair to investors in the circumstances, but on what should be a basis reasonable to the Government, to the investors, and to the American people liable for repayment of all Government obligations contracted? I feel assured that our Government officials will do, and are doing, their whole duty in this respect. The Government here, as it has elsewhere since the outbreak of the war, has necessarily put its hands on transportation, on most kinds of production, and in a way on labor. It embargoes both exports and imports. It has, in other words, become a factor in the labor market, in the production and prices of foodstuffs, in the manufacture and prices of all essential war supplies, in shipbuilding, and in the operation and rate making of all lines of transportation. It is a still larger factor in the money market. It is not only the biggest borrower, but the biggest lender.

I am not indicating my views as to how high interest rates to the Government should go now or during the war, but I do emphasize the view, not to say the necessity, that no high point to which interest rates are bid up by a group of bankers or a group of other business men, or by any locality, for some temporary profit-making purpose, should be allowed to control the fair interest level for the Government waging this great war in behalf of all classes of people and of business. I am glad strongly to commend the Treasury's course thus far, and feel satisfied as to its future course. Let there be no profiteering in interest at the expense of the Government at this time of its dire need any more than in war supplies. With the Government the question of borrowing money with which to prosecute the war is immediately followed by the close secondary problem of how to deal with the huge debt which will exist at the end of the war.

On September 13, in closing my remarks in support of the second war bond-issue measure, I said:

> The motto of every citizen should be, "To produce and to save." He should then be content to turn over to the Government, if necessary, the maximum amount of his profits and savings above the portion strictly necessary for personal and business requirements. If the war should continue for another year or more, the extreme necessity for producing and saving with a view of aiding the Government to the fullest possible extent will later become far more apparent than now.

May I, with emphasis, repeat this utterance? This should not only be the motto of every citizen, but of every department, bureau, and division of the Government. Foreign governments at war, as I know ours has and will in every possible way, have long since inaugurated many new systems and methods of checks and balances on expenditures, including a system of expenditure control in each department, with the result that large savings have been made without impediment or delay in the prosecution of the war. Some time ago the English Government caused an order to be sent throughout the army with respect to salvage. Salvage commissions to collect and deal with unserviceable materials were appointed. In the reply made by Mr. Bonar Law for the Government in the House of Commons on January 14, 1918, the following statement, among others, was made:

> Amongst the results achieved: From waste fats collected from army camps alone have been produced (1) sufficient tallow to provide soap for the entire army, navy, and Government departments, with a surplus for public use, producing an annual revenue of $4,800,000, in addition to saving valuable tonnage; (2) 1,800 tons of glycerine for munitions sufficient to provide the propellant for 18,000,000 18-pounder shells. The glycerine costs the Government $300 per ton, as compared with $1,500 per ton, the price of imported glycerine; (3) while over $5,000,000 worth of military rags have been recovered and used in the manufacture of new cloth and blankets for the army.

The fourth and last report of the expenditures committee shows that from technical investigations savings of $15,000,000 on cordite contracts have resulted; also $175,000,000 on gun ammunition; $10,000,000 on gun equipment; and $5,000,000 on aircraft.

Mr. Chairman, may I divert from the bill long enough to say that England finally woke up to the fact that since her first advance toward Paris Germany's principal gains have been made by her propaganda system? England now has a minister of propaganda. It was my view months ago that this Government should set aside $50,000,000 for legitimate propaganda work to expose and offset the German system and to present our true attitude and the real war situation to the people of Russia and of several other countries where this work has been sorely needed.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I most heartily support this bill as the most desirable and efficient method of rendering financial aid so urgently needed. It will strengthen—not weaken—existing financial agencies. We are approaching a severe test of our financial strength. We can and shall successfully stand that test. To do so with greatest certainty and safety, however, a better and fuller realization of the huge burdens to be met and borne must be awakened in the minds of many citizens and business concerns.

Some personal and nonessential business sacrifices will have to be made, just as in other countries at war. Our war industries and our allies, for example, must have adequate fuel, even at the expense of the expansion of nonessential concerns.

All that is valuable and dear to humanity is at stake in this war. The achievements of hundreds of years in the higher, greater, and better development of government, education, Christianity, finance, commerce, and civilization itself hang in the balance. The Anglo-Saxon race fighting for the allied cause will not let them be stricken down. The outcome is not in doubt. I have had, and now have, the firmest and most unalterable faith in victory. We can, we must, we shall win. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

FRANCE.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF ISSUE OF SECURITIES BY PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

On May 31, 1916, the French Parliament passed the following "law restricting the right of issuing securities during the continuance of hostilities" (Journal Officiel, June 1, 1916, p. 4854; Legislation de la guerre de 1914–1916, vol. 4, p. 209):

"SEC. 1. The issuing, advertising, placing on sale, or introducing into the market in France of bonds or other securities of foreign governments or of stock or shares of whatever nature of French or foreign cities, corporations, or companies is forbidden from the date of the publication of this law until such time as shall be determined by a decree in council of the ministers after the cessation of hostilities.

"This provision, however, is subject to modification by order of the minister of finance.

"SEC. 2. Infractions of this law shall be punishable by imprisonment for not less than six months and not more than one year and by a fine of 1,000 to 10,000 francs; in case of a second offense by imprisonment for not less than one and not more than two years and by a fine of 10,000 to 25,000 francs.

"Section 463 (this section provides that when, in the case of a person convicted of crime, the jury finds extenuating circumstances, the penalty shall be modified in a certain manner, as set forth in the laws of May 13, 1863, Nov. 27, 1870, and Oct. 26, 1888) of the Penal Code shall apply to this law."

Two months after its passage the law of May 31, 1916, received an official interpretation from the minister of finance, in reply to a question put to him in the Chamber of Deputies by M. Bergeon.

The question was, Whether the law of May 31, 1916, is infringed by such companies as increase their capital without appealing to credit or publicity, but by inserting in a newspaper a notification of the calling of an extraordinary general meeting for the purpose of increasing the company's capital.

The reply was, The provisions of the law of May 31, 1916, place no obstacle in the way of the fulfillment by the companies of legal or statutory formalities required for the issue of additional stock. The placing of this stock, however, if effected by an appeal to the public or through publicity, falls under the ban of the law.

GERMANY.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF ISSUE OF SECURITIES BY PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

[Proclamation of Mar. 8, 1917, relating to Government control of the issue of bonds or preferred stock (Reichs-Gesetzblatt 1917, p. 220).]

The Bundesrath, by virtue of the power vested in it by section 3 of the act of August 4, 1914 (RGB., p. 327), authorizing the Bundesrath to adopt economic measures, does hereby proclaim the following order:

"SECTION 1. Until further notice bonds issued within the Empire of a definite nominal value payable in money, which, in the proportion of such nominal value to the entire indebtedness give to the bondholders substantially equal rights, may not be put in circulation unless authorized by the Government. With respect to bonds payable to bearer, the existing provisions of law remain in force.

"Until further notice companies within the Empire may not issue preferred stock which entitles the holder to a definite maximum dividend fixed in advance unless authorized by the Government.

"SEC. 2. Such authorization may be given by the central authorities of the State in whose territory the person issuing the bonds has his domicile, or his industrial establishment, or in which the company has its principal place of business.

"The validity of the bonds or of the stock shall not be affected by the want of such authorization.

"SEC. 3. Whoever, contrary to the provisions of section 1 of this order, issues bonds or stock without the authorization of the Government, or acts contrary to the conditions accompanying such authorization, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one-fifth of the nominal value of the bonds or stock which have been issued without the authorization of the Government, or with reference to which the conditions imposed have been violated; the minimum fine shall be 1,000 marks.

"SEC. 4. The foregoing order shall take effect on the day of its promulgation. The imperial chancellor may determine when this order shall cease to be effective."

STATE CONTROL OVER ESTABLISHMENT AND EXTENSION OF COMPANIES IN GERMANY.

[From Board of Trade Journal, Dec. 6, 1917, p. 517.]

According to the Deutscher Reichsanzeiger (Berlin) of November 6, a Bundesrath order, dated November 2 requires until further notice the consent of the State governments for:

"1. The establishment of a share company or limited company with more than 300,000 marks (about £15,000 at par exchange) of original capital. If shares are issued at a premium the actual issue price is the one to be considered.

"2. Any decision to make such an increase in the original capital of a share company or limited company founded after November 5, 1917, as will bring the original capital of such a company up to more than 300,000 marks; and any decision to make such an increase in the original capital of a share company or limited company founded before November 5, 1917, as will bring the total additions since that date to the original capital of such company up to more than 300,000 marks.

"3. Any decision to issue participating certificates conferring a claim upon the dividends of a share company or limited company, or upon a share of the property of such company in the event of its dissolution."

The State government competent to grant the requisite permission in any particular case is the Government in whose territory the company is question is established or is to be established. The imperial chancellor is authorized to prescribe that the consent may be granted only in agreement with himself or with an authority specified by him.

A regulation, dated November 2, issued by the imperial chancellor under this order, prescribes that the consent required by the order shall be granted by the State governments only in agreement with the directorate of the imperial bank.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF ISSUE OF SECURITIES IN CANADA.

[Text of orders in council Dec. 22, 1917; Jan. 9, 1918.]

CANADIAN ORDER IN COUNCIL, DATED DECEMBER 22, 1917.

Whereas it is advisable that the Canadian investment market should be conserved to facilitate the borrowing of the large sums of money that will be required for the prosecution of the war and to enable His Excellency's Government, if need be, to fully avail itself of the loaning capacity of the country for the paramount purposes of national defense, and that the impairing of the market should be prevented by forbidding the offering and sale thereon of securities for raising money for purposes the execution of which may, in the public interest, be postponed until peace has been restored, provision being made for the issue by the minister of finance of a certificate permitting the offering and sale of such securities as the said minister shall deem proper to except from such prohibition;

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the minister of finance and under the provisions of the war-measures act, 1914, is pleased to enact the following regulations, and the same are hereby made and enacted accordingly:

1. It shall be unlawful within Canada, by or on behalf of any provincial, colonial, or foreign government, municipality, commission, local government, institution, corporation, or incorporated company to issue, sell, offer, or advertise for sale any bonds, debentures, or other securities evidencing an obligation to repay money borrowed, which may hereafter be issued by or on behalf of any such colonial or foreign government, municipality, commission, local government, institution, corporation, or incorporated company as aforesaid, or any shares which may hereafter be issued of the capital stock, whether preferred or common, of any such corporation or incorporated company, or to purchase or agree to purchase any of the bonds, debentures, or other securities or shares of capital stock aforesaid, unless the offering and sale thereof within Canada shall have been first approved by the minister of finance by his certificate of approval in writing: Provided, That nothing herein shall affect the issue, offering, advertising, sale, or purchase of any bonds, debentures, or securities of the Government of Canada, or the trading in any bonds, debentures, securities, or shares of capital stock heretofore issued and placed upon the market, or which shall have been originally issued and placed upon the market with the approval of the minister of finance evidenced by his certificate as aforesaid.

2. Any issue or sale made in contravention of the foregoing prohibition shall be deemed to be in excess of the authority of the provincial, colonial, or foreign government, municipality, commission, local government, institution, corporation, or incorporated company on behalf of which the same is made, and may be restrained by action at the suit of the attorney general of Canada in the public interest; and, moreover, any person issuing, selling, or offering or advertising for sale or purchasing or agreeing to purchase any such bonds, debentures, or other securities, or any shares of capital stock so issued, sold, offered, or advertised for sale, without the certificate of approval hereinbefore required, shall be guilty of an offense, and shall be liable, on summary conviction before two or more justices under the procedure prescribed by Part XV of the Criminal Code, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or to both imprisonment and fine, in the discretion of the tribunal.

3. For the purposes of the foregoing regulations the words "sale," "sell," and "purchase," and their parts, shall be held and interpreted to include mortgaging, pledging, or parting with any right or interest in consideration of money, or, as the case may be, acquiring, by way of mortgage, pledge, or otherwise, any right or interest in consideration of money.

CANADIAN ORDER IN COUNCIL, DATED JANUARY 9, 1918.

Whereas the minister of finance reports that he is informed that securities have been issued and sold without the certificate of approval required by the regulations enacted by the order in council of the 22d day of December, 1917 (P. C. No. 3439), such issues having been made and securities sold and purchased by the parties concerned without knowledge on their part of the said regulations; and

Whereas in the case of these issues there would have been no objection, in the public interest, to the granting of a certificate of approval if it had been applied for, and as the effect of the said order is to make the securities illegal and the several parties liable to penalties, and as there may be other causes of a similar nature of which the minister of finance has not been advised, or which may arise in the future, it is therefore deemed desirable that the regulations should be amended and the following regulations enacted and made:

Therefore his excellency in council, on the recommendation of the minister of finance and in virtue of the powers in that behalf conferred by the war-measures act, 1914, or otherwise vested in the governor general in council, is pleased to make the following regulations and the same are hereby made and enacted accordingly.

REGULATIONS.

1. Notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the regulation enacted by the order in council of the 22d of December, 1917 (P. C. 3439), the minister of finance shall have power to give his certificate of approval for the offering and sale within Canada of any bonds, debentures, or other securities or shares of capital stock referred to in said regulations after the same have been issued, offered, advertised for sale, sold, purchased, agreed to be purchased, mortgaged, or pledged, or any right or interest therein has been parted with or acquired, and such certificate, or proper evidence of the issue thereof, shall be conclusive evidence that the offering and sale within Canada of the bonds, debentures, or other securities or shares of capital stock mentioned in such certificate was duly authorized and approved by the said minister; and that the issuing, offering, sale, advertising for sale, or otherwise dealing with such securities or shares, or any right or interest therein, was not done in contravention of the said regulations, and did not constitute an offense thereunder.

2. The minister of finance may grant his certificate of approval, as aforesaid, with respect to any bonds, debentures, or other securities or shares of capital stock referred to in the said regulations which have been or may be issued on or after the said 22d day of December, 1917.

3. The powers conferred upon the minister of finance by the said regulations and by these regulations may also be used and exercised by a minister acting for, or, if the office is vacant, in the place of, the said minister, and also his successors in such office and his or their lawful deputy.

ENGLAND.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF SECURITY ISSUES.

The Government control or regulation of security issues in the United Kingdom is effected to a large extent through the London Stock Exchange. As a condition of reopening the stock exchange the treasury made public a memorandum dated December 24, 1914, approving the opening of the stock exchange from January 4, 1915, subject to certain restrictions which the treasury therein imposed. One restriction is as follows:

"No dealings shall be allowed in any new issue made after January 4, 1915, unless specially allowed by the committee and approved by the treasury."

Another provision of this memorandum was as follows:

"It should further be borne in mind that many of the transactions which the rules are designed to prevent are illegal under the trading-with-the-enemy acts and proclamations or under the common law."

These various acts are then cited in the footnotes. On January 27, 1915, the treasury announced that the chancellor of the exchequer had appointed a committee to consider and advise upon applications received by the treasury for approval of fresh issues. The committee consisted of five persons, one of whom was the governor of the Bank of England and another a member of the board of trade.

On January 19, 1915, the treasury made the following announcement as to control of fresh issues of capital:

"In connection with the reopening of the stock exchanges the treasury have had under consideration the general conditions under which new issues of capital in the United Kingdom can be permitted during the continuance of the war.

"It appears to the treasury that in the present crisis all other considerations must be subordinated to the paramount necessity of husbanding the financial resources of the country with a view to the successful prosecution of the war. Accordingly, they wish it to be understood that until further notice they feel it imperative in the national interest that fresh issues of capital shall be approved by the treasury before they are made.

"Treasury approval will be governed by the following general conditions:

"(1) Issues for undertakings carried on or to be carried on in the United Kindgom shall only be allowed where it is shown to the satisfaction of the treasury that they are advisable in the national interest.

"(2) Issues or participations in issues for undertakings carried on or to be carried on in the British Empire overseas shall only be allowed where it is shown to the satisfaction of the treasury that urgent necessity and special circumstances exist.

"(3) Issues or participations in issues for undertakings carried on or to be carried on outside the British Empire shall not be allowed.

"(4) The treasury will not in ordinary cases insist upon the above restrictions where issues are required for the renewal of treasury bills or other short instruments held here and falling due of foreign or colonial governments or municipal corporations or railways or other undertakings.

"All applications should be made in the first instance to the treasury. The treasury will not be prepared to approve under paragraph 4 (3) of the temporary regulations for the reopening of the stock exchange (a) any dealings in new issues which have not been approved by the treasury before they are made."

On January 29, 1915, the following treasury notice as to control of fresh issues of capital was issued:

"The approval of the treasury should be obtained for all these issues of capital of whatever nature, whether made on behalf of a Government, municipality, or other public body, or any company, whether public or private. Treasury approval is not required for calls of installments on shares, stock, debentures, or bonds already issued.

"All applications for approval of fresh issues should be addressed to the Treasury, the envelope being marked "Capital issues." In order to save delay and reduce correspondence to the minimum it is desirable that the fullest particulars should be given in each case."

On March 25, 1915, the following circular letter of the local government to local authorities as to approval of fresh issues of capital was made public:

"BORROWING BY LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

"SIR: In their circular letter of the 11th instant, the local government board referred to the decision of the lords commissioners of His Majesty's treasury to restrict capital issues by local authorities within the narrowest limits: (a) It was pointed out in the same circular letter that labor should be economized by local authorities as far as possible and that the inception of new works, except such as are of pressing necessity either for reasons of public health or on account of war requirements, should be avoided.

"The board have been in communication with their lordships in regard to this matter and it has now been arranged, in order to meet the convenience of local authorities and to avoid duplication of labor, that the sanction, approval, or consent of the local government board to any borrowing under powers conferred by public general acts or by local acts or provisional orders, under which such sanction, approval, or consent is required, shall suffice without any further approval by the treasury where—

"(a) The sanction, approval, or consent has been given on a date subsequent to the 12th instant; and

"(b) The money proposed to be raised is to be raised otherwise than by the issue of stock, bonds, or bills.

"Where a local authority hold a sanction, approval, or consent of the board of an earlier date than the 12th instant which has not yet been acted upon, whether wholly or in part, no further action must be taken upon it without a further sanction from the board authorizing the action unless the money is to be raised by the issue of stock, bonds, or bills, when the consent of the treasury must be obtained instead of the further sanction of the board.

"The treasury have further decided that their approval will not henceforth be required for the renewal or replacement by local authorities of maturing mortgages.

"With respect to the statement in the board's circular letter, to which reference is made in the first paragraph above that it has become necessary to avoid the inception of all new works except such as are of pressing necessity, either for reasons of public health or on account of war requirements, it must be understood that these terms will be construed in their strict sense.

"Consequently, before any application is made to the board with a view to the immediate execution of works, local authorities should fully satisfy themselves that they can show that the expenditure can not be avoided, postponed, or reduced. Any application should be accompanied by a statement of the facts upon which the local authority rely to prove these points.

"The treasury are anxious that the attention of local authorities should be particularly drawn to the fact that economies and restrictions on borrowing are possible not only as regards new works but also as regards works in progress. As regards these latter, it will frequently be found possible by arrangement with contractors or otherwise to postpone works or parts of them or to enlarge the period allowed under contract for their completion. In any case in which an application for sanction to this board or to the treasury is necessary, where works are in progress or are the subject of a contract, it will be necessary to demonstrate that every possible effort has been made in this direction before the extent of the application has been finally determined upon."

On May 18, 1915, the chancellor of the exchequer was asked in the House of Commons whether he was aware that the treasury has no power to prevent the registration of a new joint stock company in regard to which it has refused to approve the issue of the capital with which it proposes to operate, and whether he proposes to ask Parliament for power to prohibit the issue of such capital. The following answer was given:

"The treasury have no legal power to make their disapproval of fresh issues of capital effective, and the Government do not propose to seek such power at the present time. I do not, however, consider it probable that in present circumstances promoters will persist in propositions of which the treasury have expressed disapproval, or that if they do persist, such propositions will be supported by the public. Should they do so, the question whether any advantage they may thereby obtain over those who have been content to be guided by the rules laid down should not be counterbalanced by special fiscal burdens will not fail to receive careful consideration."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from North Carolina expect to proceed any further to-night?

Mr. KITCHIN. Has the gentleman anyone who desires to speak now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We had intended to yield some time to those in opposition to the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] is here, also the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], and the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] has made some arrangement in behalf of these gentlemen.

Mr. KITCHIN. Do these gentlemen desire to be heard to-night?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is now 6 o'clock, and there are only about 30 gentlemen in the room, and I think it is time to adjourn.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10608, the war finance corporation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Young, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3799. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1854) to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9867) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and had ordered that Mr. MARTIN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WARREN be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1854. An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4099. An act to amend and reenact section 5200, Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

S. 3476. An act to authorize extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 3799. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SCHALL for 10 days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday next, the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, be dispensed with, that the bill H. R. 10608 be in order on that day, and that the business in order on Monday under the Calendar for Unanimous Consent be transferred to the Saturday following.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday next under the Calendar for Unanimous Consent be dispensed with and transferred to the following Saturday and that the War Finance Corporation bill be in order on Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that, except that I would like to know whether the gentleman proposes to use all day Monday in general debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I am going to make an arrangement about that afterwards.

Mr. NORTON. I would like to ask the gentleman how long he expects it will take before we finish this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. We hope to finish the bill by Tuesday night. I regard it as important that we should take Monday for the consideration of this bill, and that we should transfer the business in order on Monday to Saturday, in order that that calendar may be considered. Following the consideration of this bill it has been agreed and understood that the Moon bill, increasing the pay of the postal employees will be taken up and considered. Between now and March 26 we will have to pass another bond bill, and it is important that this bill should be gotten out of the way, so that we can take up the bond bill at the earliest possible moment, because the liberty loan campaign will begin on April 6, and some printing concerning it must be had. I think this bill ought to follow right along until we finish it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest that the gentleman make his request that the business in order on Calendar Monday be transferred to Saturday only as to unobjected bills. I make that suggestion for this reason: A great many Members of the House, as the gentleman well knows, are from nearby districts and leave the city on Friday night.

If the agreement is that business in order on Monday will be transferred to the following Saturday, that would bring up important matters that would be controverted under suspension of the rules. There is a large Unanimous Consent Calendar at present, but on no call of the calendar since the convening of this Congress has that calendar been completed.

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean, to confine it to unanimous consent?

Mr. STAFFORD. Unobjected to.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is, motions for suspending the rules?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will modify that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman modify it?

Mr. KITCHIN. I modify it by moving that business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and business on next Monday be dispensed with, and that unanimous-consent bills—that is, bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar only, unobjected to—be called on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the business properly coming up next Monday, unanimous consent and suspension of the rules and motions to discharge committees, be transferred to next Saturday, and that on next Saturday that no bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be considered except those unobjected to.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, the business on Saturday be confined to the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. That business on next Saturday shall be confined to the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. That the order for next Saturday shall be bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and that bills may be considered on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that are not objected to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business that would be in order under the general rules of the House next Monday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will adopt that suggestion and make that request.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I will object to that request.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business that would be in order next Monday under the rules be dispensed with, and that the bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar be considered on the Saturday following, but that no motion to suspend the rules shall be made on that day. That gets what you are after.

The SPEAKER. Does that satisfy the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]?

Mr. STAFFORD. That meets the request of "the gentleman from Wisconsin."

The SPEAKER. Why did you not say so?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because it was not submitted before, Mr. Speaker, in that form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that the bills in order on next Monday be transferred to next Saturday, and that next Saturday nothing except the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be considered, and that no motion to suspend the rules or a motion to discharge committees shall be considered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INDUSTRIAL CREDITS—LIMIT OF GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, I want to see if we can not agree that all general debate on the War Finance Corporation bill be closed when the committee rises on next Monday. I will not, of course, make the motion that the committee should rise before 5 o'clock anyway.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan left a long list of those who desired to speak in general debate. I presume it will run over four or five hours. If the gentleman thinks we can get through on Monday, so that all these gentlemen may be accommodated——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will not move to rise until we do get through.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that general debate shall be limited by the rising of the committee on Monday afternoon next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is general debate, and if we do not go under the five-minute rule for considering amendments on Monday, had we not better meet at 11 o'clock?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has called a meeting of the committee at 10 o'clock a. m. Will he be able to finish?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; because we will meet in this room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, March 18, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the 14th instant submitting revised estimate of schedules of salaries for teachers and certain officials of the public schools of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, amounting to $2,312,800 (H. Doc. No. 976), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HARDY, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 1545) to amend the act of March 3, 1913, entitled "An act to regulate the officering and manning of vessels subject to the inspection laws of the United States," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 389), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. MAYS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8444) for the relief of Ira G. Kilpatrick and Guy D. Dill, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 388), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10300) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Spate, helpless child of Joseph Spate, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAMTON: A bill (H. R. 10782) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine service and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve, and for other purposes," as amended by act approved October 22, 1914; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. STINESS: Petition of medical society and residents of Washington County, R. I., favoring the passage of bill granting increased rank to officers in the Medical Corps of the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 18, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift up our hearts to Thee that we may draw from Thee those qualities of heart and mind that fit us for the duties and responsibilities of this high office. Thou dost minister out of Thine own hand direct the highest and best gifts to men who seek Thy face. We pray that the gift that Thou dost bring, that Thou dost inspire, that Thou dost breathe may be given to us this day, that with all purity of heart and purpose we may serve the people and serve God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS (H. DOC. NO. 977).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list and schedule of useless papers without historic value on the files of the Department of Labor and requesting action looking to their disposition. The communication and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives thereof.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1854) to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before beginning morning business I think we ought to have a quorum. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague [Mr. JAMES] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day. I also wish to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KENDRICK] is away from the city on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution of the State of Wisconsin, pertaining to the loyalty and war work of that State, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution No. 3 A.

Joint resolution relating to the loyalty and war work of the State of Wisconsin.

The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in senate and assembly, hereby again renew their allegiance to the Republic and pledge their loyalty and undivided support to the National Government in its prosecution of the present war to a successful end, and in this moment of struggle, which threatens the very existence of the Nation, will never shirk in their duty as loyal citizens to their beloved country.

The State of Wisconsin stands second to none in meeting the demands made upon it by the Federal Government for our national defense.

Wisconsin took the initiative in providing for the dependents of its soldiers and has made the most liberal provision for them of any State in the Union.

Wisconsin placed its entire election machinery at the disposal of the United States in the first registration for selective service.

Wisconsin was the first State in the Union to file a complete return of its registration under the selective-service law with the Federal Government at Washington.

Wisconsin's administration of the selective-service law has repeatedly received the highest commendation from the War Department and other Federal authorities.

In Wisconsin less than 2 per cent of the men called under the selective-service law failed to respond to the call, while in the United States as a whole $8\frac{4}{10}$ per cent of those called failed to respond.

Wisconsin stands at the head of the list of her neighboring States in the percentage of volunteer enlistments, which numbered over 17,000, 45 per cent of which are of Teutonic blood. The percentage in Illinois was 34.8; Indiana, 41.6; Iowa, 59; Michigan, 31.1; Minnesota, 31.4; Kentucky, 35.8; while in Wisconsin our percentage was 54.5.

Wisconsin's troops when they left Camp Douglas were fully equipped, not by the Federal Government but by the State.

Wisconsin's citizens have contributed over $125,000,000 to liberty loans, Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, and other war activities. Our subscription to the first liberty loan was $36,236,750. Our subscription to the second liberty loan was $87,056,900. In the seventh Federal reserve district the subscription of this State was 155 per cent of its minimum allotment. In this loan Wisconsin stood at the head of all the States in this district. Illinois stood second, with a percentage of 152.8; Michigan third, with a percentage of 142.5; Indiana fourth, with a percentage of 122; and Iowa fifth, with a percentage of 111.4.

Wisconsin is proud of the foregoing record, and submits the same to the fair and impartial judgment of all loyal citizens of the Nation and pledges itself to even greater accomplishments in the future.

The people of the State of Wisconsin always have stood and always will stand squarely behind the National Government in all things which are essential to bring the present war to a successful end, and we condemn Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE and all others who have failed to see the righteousness of our Nation's cause, who have failed to support our Government in matters vital to the winning of the war, and we denounce any attitude or utterance of theirs which has tended to incite sedition among the people of our country and to injure Wisconsin's fair name before the free peoples of the world.

The people of Wisconsin recognize that the Government should not at this time be hampered by any partisan spirit that may interfere with the military program of the Nation, and we assure the Federal authorities that the people of this State stand ready and willing to give every possible assistance in all things that may be required to win the war, and we denounce all seditious utterances which, under the guise of free speech, are seeking to incite sedition and anarchy within or without our borders.

We condemn no person on account of birth or ancestry, but we do especially commend those patriotic citizens who have ties of either birth or friendship with our enemies, and who are at this time standing shoulder to shoulder with those of our citizens of other birth and ancestry.

In conclusion we declare that the people of Wisconsin recognize no party or factional loyalty, but, on the other hand, most heartily commend the loyalty of all our citizens irrespective of nationality or present party affiliations.

The speaker of the assembly and the president of the senate are hereby instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States and to the presiding officer of the Senate and House of Representatives.

EDWARD F. DITTEMAR,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
LAWRENCE C. WHITTET,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a number of petitions from Georgia prepared under the leadership of the American Defense Society asking for legislation looking toward the punishment of various lines of activity therein mentioned. I send them to the desk and ask that the usual notation be made in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and suggest that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Petitions from sundry citizens of Columbus, Savannah, Atlanta, Stone Mountain, Kirkwood, Clarkeston, Brunswick, and Thomasville, all in the State of Georgia.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Fairfield County Medical Society, of the New Haven County Medical Society, and of the Hartford County Medical Society, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for an advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Manchester, of Hartford, of Newton, and of Bridgeport, and of the Capitol City Lodge, No. 354, International Association of Machinists, of Hartford, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented a petition of the congregation of the Baptist Church, of Salem, W. Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors during the period of the war, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the Fair Price Food Committee, of Thief River Falls, Minn., relative to the price of wheat as compared to the relative prices of other cereals, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Simon Mix Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Minnesota, of Pipestone, Minn., praying for an increase in pensions to soldiers of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Branch No. 214, National Association of Letter Carriers, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for an increase in the salaries of letter carriers, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HALE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for the submission of a Federal amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Aroostook County Medical Society, of Maine, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for an advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of Typographical Union, No. 18, and a petition of German-American Typographical Union, No. 21, of Detroit, Mich., praying for an increase in pensions to veterans of the Civil War, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Academy of Medicine, of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps in the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Seventh-Day Adventists, of Battle Creek, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of certain Sunday laws, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 369) granting a pension to Pyrrhus Williams, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REMOVAL OF STATUE OF FREDERICK THE GREAT.

Mr. THOMAS. On Saturday last I introduced the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 140) providing for the removal and disposition of the statue of Frederick the Great, and asked that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I find that the joint resolution properly belongs to the Committee on the Library. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution and that it be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 4132) to amend the fifty-second and fifty-third Articles of War; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4133) granting a pension to George W. Childs (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. GOFF):

A bill (S. 4134) granting an increase of pension to Beckwith A. McNemar (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4136) granting an increase of pension to John G. Jackson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4137) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 141) amending the act of July 2, 1909, governing the holding of civil-service examinations; to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

COURTS IN WESTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TILLMAN. I introduce a bill (S. 4135) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the appointment of a district judge, district attorney, and marshal for the western district of South Carolina, and for other purposes,' approved September 1, 1916," so as to change the time of holding courts in the western district of South Carolina, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I also ask that the bill, along with the memorandum attached, be printed for the information of those who care to look into it and so that the memorandum will not get lost.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill and accompanying memorandum are as follows:

A bill (S. 4135) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the appointment of a district judge, district attorney, and marshal for the western district of South Carolina, and for other purposes,' approved September 1, 1916," so as to change the time of holding courts in the western district of South Carolina.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a district judge, district attorney, and marshal for the western district of South Carolina, and for other purposes," approved September 1, 1916, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the terms of the district court for the eastern district shall be held at Charleston on the first Tuesday in June and December; at Columbia on the third Tuesday in January and first Tuesday in November; at Florence the first Tuesday in March; and at Aiken on the first Tuesday in April and October.

"Terms of the district court for the western district shall be held at Greenville on the second Tuesday in August and the third Tuesday in February; at Rock Hill on the fourth Tuesday in November and second Tuesday in May; at Greenwood the second Tuesday in September and third Tuesday in March; at Anderson the third Tuesday in October and second Tuesday in January; at Spartanburg the first Tuesday in January, equity court.

"The office of the clerk of the district court for the western district shall be at Greenville, and the office of the clerk of the district court for the eastern district shall be at Charleston."

MEMORANDUM ON PROPOSED AMENDMENT BY THE CLERK OF THAT COURT.

It provides for changing the time of the holding of the courts for the western district only. For instance, the heaviest courts we have are Greenville in April and October, two of the very busiest seasons for the farmers. At practically every place our courts conflict with the State courts, and the lawyers having cases in our courts can not attend on this account. At two places we have to use the State courthouses, and arrangements always have to be made to postpone our court or the State court. This proposed amendment has the approval of the judge, the marshal, and the lawyers generally and will avoid the above conflicts.

OVERTIME PAY FOR CLERKS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to give notice of a motion to suspend the rules that I may propose an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill. I ask that the notice be read at the desk.

The Secretary read the notice, as follows:

I hereby give notice in writing that when the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 9054) is being considered in the Senate I shall move to suspend paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Rule XVI of the Senate, which provide that no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill or to add a new item of appropriation; that amendments proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; and that when actually proposed to the bill no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received, in order that I may propose the following amendment:

On page 91, at the end of line 16, insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That work required in excess of eight hours shall be paid for at the rate of one and one-half times the regular compensation of the employee, computed on an hourly basis."

ST. LOUIS, BROWNSVILLE & MEXICO RAILWAY.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have a communication which I desire to put in the RECORD, following a brief explanation.

February 14 and 16 the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], speaking to what is known as the railroad-control bill, referred to the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co. In addition to what he said in the body of his speech, at the close of his remarks he inserted an extended table covering numerous railroads purporting to show their several earnings, or, I might better say, showing their per cent of earnings on capital. This table represents the earnings of the road mentioned as being 51 per cent on invested capital.

I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. G. H. Walker, of St. Louis, who is the vice president of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co., in which Mr. Walker gives what he says is the real per cent of earnings on the capital of that company. This statement is very different from the per cent of capital earnings of that company as given by the Senator from Iowa.

The Senator from Iowa in the table I refer to stated that the average per cent of net income on capital stock on the railroad mentioned—the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico—was 52.71 per cent. The vice president of the company, Mr. Walker, states that for the period covered the per cent was only 4.49 per cent of the earnings, and he asked me, as far as I can, to correct what he thinks was an unintentional mistake of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, I know this gentleman, Mr. Walker, and it is sufficient for me to say, which I do with great pleasure, that there is no business man in St. Louis held in more universal esteem.

I ask leave that his letter, which I send to the desk, may be printed in the RECORD as corrective of the statement made by the Senator from Iowa.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., March 13, 1918.

Senator WILLIAM J. STONE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Recently in a discussion of the railway bill before the United States Senate, Senator CUMMINS made the point that the earnings on the comon stock of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co. were very large. He indicated the figure of 52 per cent.

I desire to give you the facts in the matter, with the suggestion that you use them in any manner you see fit that will correct the impression created by this statement:

ST. LOUIS, BROWNSVILLE & MEXICO RAILWAY.

This is a Texas corporation, operating a line of railway extending from Houston to Brownsville, Tex., including several branches. The total mileage operated is 548.18 miles. This company is a subsidiary of the New Orleans, Texas & Mexico Railway Co., which operates what are commonly known as the Gulf Coast Lines. The New Orleans, Texas & Mexico Railway Co. own the stock and funded debt of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co.

The capitalization of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co. reported as of September 30, 1917, was as follows:

Capital stock	$500,000
First-mortgage bonds	12,913,341
Equipment notes	535,000
Demand notes to New Orleans, Texas & Mexico Railway Co	499,309
Total	14,447,650
To which it is proper to add:
Appropriated surplus	537,234
Profit and loss surplus	908,090
Final total	15,892,974

The latter item may be called the "capital invested," and that it is conservative will be evident from the valuation of $15,594,245 assigned by the Texas Railroad Commission to this property in the report issued by the commission covering the fiscal year ended June 30, 1916.

The total income of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co. applicable to interest and dividends—that is, after allowing for rentals and hire of equipment—is reported as follows:

12 months ended June 30, 1913	$234,647
12 months ended June 30, 1914	154,691
12 months ended June 30, 1915	403,488
6 months ended Dec. 31, 1915	361,774
12 months ended Dec. 31, 1916	1,444,704
12 months ended Dec. 31, 1917	1,325,623
Average 5½ years	713,623

The average net income is thus equal to 4.49 per cent on the figure of $15,892,974, taken as the "invested capital."

As you will see by the letterhead, I am vice president of the Gulf Coast Lines, which owns and operates the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico, and along with many of your other friends in St. Louis am deeply interested in the welfare of the property.

I would thank you for anything you can do for me in this matter.

Yours, very truly,

G. H. WALKER.

ERADICATION OF ADULT ILLITERACY.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Secretary Lane to myself with reference to a pending bill and a matter of great urgency. To-morrow morning I shall call the attention of the Senate to the bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 12, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I believe that the time has come when we should give serious consideration to the education of those who can not read or write in the United States. The war has brought facts to our attention that are almost unbelievable and that are in themselves accusatory. There are in the United States (or were when the census was taken in 1910) 5,516,163 persons over 10 years of age who were unable to read or write in any language. There are now nearly 700,000 men of draft age in the United States who are, I presume, registered, who can not read or write in English or in any other language. Over 4,600,000 of the illiterates in this country were 20 years of age or more. This figure equals the total population of the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico, and Delaware. The percentage of illiterates varies in the several States from 1.7 per cent in Iowa to 29 per cent in Louisiana. More than 10 per cent of it was in 13 States. Half of the illiterates were between 20 and 45 years of age. It has been estimated by one of those concerned with this problem that if these five million and a half illiterate persons were stretched in a double line of march at intervals of 3 feet and were to march past the White House at the rate of 25 miles a day it would require more than two months for them to pass. Over 58 per cent are white persons, and of these 1,500,000 are native-born whites.

I beg you to consider the economic loss arising out of this condition. If the productive labor value of an illiterate is less by only 50 cents a day than that of an educated man or woman, the country is losing $825,000,000 a year through illiteracy. This estimate is no doubt under rather than over the real loss. The Federal Government and the States spend millions of dollars in trying to give information to the people in rural districts about farming and home making. Yet 3,700,000, or 10 per cent, of our country folk can not read or write a word. They can not read a bulletin on agriculture, a farm paper, a food-pledge card, a liberty-loan appeal, a newspaper, the Constitution of the United States, or their Bibles, nor can they keep personal or business accounts. An uninformed democracy is not a democracy. A people who can not have means of access to the mediums of public opinion and to the messages of the President and the acts of Congress can hardly be expected to understand the full meaning of this war, to which they all must contribute in life or property or labor.

It would seem to be almost axiomatic that an illiterate man can not make a good soldier in modern warfare. Until last April the Regular Army would not enlist illiterates, yet in the first draft between 30,000 and 40,000 illiterates were brought into the Army and approximately as many near illiterates.

They can not sign their names.

They can not read their orders posted daily on bulletin boards in camp.

They can not read their manual of arms.

They can not read their letters or write home.

They can not understand the signals or follow the Signal Corps in time of battle.

There are 700,000 men who can not read or write who may be drafted within our Army within the next year or two. Training camps for soldiers are not equipped for school work, and the burden of teaching men to read the simplest English should not be cast upon the officers or others in the camps. We should give some education to all our men before they enter the Army.

There is even a larger problem than this that challenges our attention, and that is the teaching of the English tongue to millions of our population. Dr. John H. Finley, president of the University of the State of New York, in a recent speech presented this picture which he found in one of the cantonments:

"How practical is the need of a language in this country common to all tongues is illustrated by what I saw in one of the great cantonments a few nights ago. In the mess hall, where I had sat an hour before with a company of the men of the National Army, a few small groups were gathered along the tables learning English under the tuition of some of their comrades, one of whom had been a district supervisor in a neighboring State and another a theological student. In one of those groups one of the exercises for the evening consisted in practicing the challenge when on sentry duty. Each pupil of the group (there were four of Italian and two of Slavic birth) shouldered in turn the long-handled stove shovel and aimed it at the teacher, who ran along the side of the room as if to evade the guard. The pupil called out in broken speech, 'Halt! Who goes there?' The answer came from the teacher, 'Friend.' And then, in as yet unintelligible English (the voices of innumerable ancestors struggling in their throats to pronounce it), the words, 'Advance and give the countersign.' So are those of confused tongues learning to speak the language of the land they have been summoned to defend. What a commentary upon our educational shortcomings that in the days of peace we had not taught these men, who have been here long enough to be citizens—and tens of thousands of their brothers with them—to know the language in which our history and laws are written and in which the commands of defense must now be given! May the end of this decade, though so near, find every citizen of our State prepared to challenge in one tongue and heart the purpose of all who come with the cry, 'Who goes there?'"

What I have said here leads to a respectful request that you give early consideration to House bill 6490, which provides for a modest appropriation for the Bureau of Education to begin and conduct a vigorous and systematic campaign for the eradication of adult illiteracy. If the bill can be passed soon, special attention can be given to teaching illiterate men of draft age, and especially those who are classified in Class A.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 16th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 3471) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant furloughs without pay and allowances to enlisted men of the Army of the United States.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 9054, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the motion offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to suspend the rule.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to present an amendment and let it lie on the table, so that I may call it up as soon as the pending amendment has been disposed of.

The amendment that I am about to offer has to do with the so-called Borland provision of the bill as passed by the House. An amendment was offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] yesterday attempting to so amend the Borland provision as to carry out the requirements of the eight-hour law. On a point of order the Chair ruled it out of order and upon appeal the ruling was sustained by the Senate. While I have not yet been able to comprehend exactly the theory upon which the Senate acted, it has acted, and I shall not attempt to bring up the same question.

I feel, however, that the situation as it now exists, unless some amendment of the nature I now present is in order, is that we will be compelled to swallow this half-baked legislation as it comes from the House or subsist upon the existing legislation.

These questions have to be settled by the Senate finally, Mr. President, because the House is pursuing exactly the same policy with regard to numerous other appropriation bills on which this same Borland provision is coming before this body. It simply means that the eight-hour law which has been adopted by Congress for many of its departments is being repudiated. It means that the policy which has not only been adopted by Congress but adopted by the various States with regard to the working of women at continuous labor and which was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States is being circumvented by this peculiar form of nonamendable legislation.

The Borland provision not only permits the heads of the departments to work the employees excessive hours, even beyond human endurance, but deprives them of the opportunity to compensate such employee by an hour's vacation. Understand that there are Senators here who base their support of the provision upon the ground of efficiency. I do not know how the same Senator who argued for an eight-hour law for women in the District of Columbia can now argue that efficiency in Government departments can be obtained by working women 10, 12, 14, or 16 hours a day. I think the theory is contrary to the experience and determination of all civilized countries. We are afraid of the expenditure of money, and instantly we lose sight of every other economic principle that this war has demonstrated in the countries of our allies.

The argument which is made by Senators here who favor the Borland provision is nothing new. It was used in England in the beginning of the European war. We know what the result was. They attempted to obtain more production by increased hours of labor; they called it "speeding up." What was the result? They found out that instead of getting an increased production the whole industrial system of Great Britain broke down. Great Britain now recognizes that it is even more necessary in times of war than in time of peace to conserve the life, health, and energy of its labor. There is no intelligent horseman who would attempt in a long race to crowd his horse at the start. If he did, he would never finish; and yet that is the theory that those who favor the Borland provision are attempting to apply to human beings.

I want to call attention to the fact that 90 per cent of these employees, so I am informed, are women, and the Supreme Court has laid down the principle—at least it has sustained the policy—that to work women over eight hours in continuous work daily tends to the destruction of the social conditions of this country; yet that is exactly what you are providing in this bill. If you are not providing that, then there is no reason for this provision at all, and it should be stricken out.

I am not opposing the working of women 8 hours a day, but I do oppose at the same time placing it in the power of some ignorant or vicious slave driver to work them 14 hours a day.

The time-and-one-half provision of the eight-hour law is not intended so much for increased pay as to deter overworking of employees.

It seems to me that on a mere matter of economy we should not lose sight of the principles that are of more value to this Government than are a few hours of work. Mr. President, I am as firmly convinced that it is more essential to conserve the life, health, and energy of the men and women of this country than it is to conserve time, wealth, or anything else. I am unwilling to see a vote on any bill which changes that policy without at least expressing intense disapproval. I feel that in the excitement attending the speeding up of this war, in the nervousness with regard to these large appropriations, we are drifting away from policies which have been heretofore established by experience.

I understand, Mr. President, that the Chair has ruled against the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on the ground that it was general legislation, and that it was an amendment to a provision of the House bill which was not general legislation but new legislation. I think I understand the distinction between "new legislation" and "general legislation," but if the Borland provision is not general legislation, then I do not understand the definition of "general legislation." If a provision of a bill which repeals or modifies existing legislation affecting a whole class is not general legislation, then I do not know what it is. But that has been decided.

The House held that the Borland provision was not subject to a point of order, because it was a limitation upon the use of the appropriation. Following that exact theory, I shall now present an amendment, which is a limitation the same as is the Borland provision, upon the use of this appropriation. If that is the rule I will follow it, but yet the amendment which I am about to offer shows the absolute absurdity of stating that something may be done negatively which can not be done affirmatively; that you may so limit an appropriation that you can prevent certain things from being done or compel certain things to be done, and yet that you can not direct that they be directly done.

I now offer the amendment, which in effect provides that none of this money shall be used to pay the salaries of the head of any department who has charge of any employees if he requires them to work over eight hours, unless for that extra work he sees that they are paid for time and a half for every hour overtime work they do.

I do not ask for a ruling upon that question now; it is not properly before the Senate, but when the time comes I believe that I can sustain the proposition that you may limit the payment of salaries to the heads of departments just as well as you can limit the payment of salaries to employees. I now ask that the amendment be read and lie on the table, to be called up at the proper time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "day," in line 16, page 91, it is proposed to insert "or to pay salaries of the heads of executive departments having charge of the employment of labor who require more than eight hours' labor of an employee each day, unless such employee is paid at the rate of time and a half for each hour over eight hours."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to say a few words in behalf of the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I hope that motion will be agreed to by the Senate, because I believe that it is only fair and just to the wheat growers of this country.

I remember well when the food-control bill was being considered that at that time there was no contention that those in authority desired to fix prices. I remember very well a meeting with several Senators from the wheat-growing States with Mr. Hoover and Judge Lindsey, who, it is claimed, prepared most of the food-control bill, and they did not contend that they wanted to fix prices. I also remember that at that meeting they were told that if the attempt were made to fix prices upon the products of the farmer the prices should also be fixed upon the machinery and articles the farmer had to buy. At that time it was the desire to prevent monopoly, hoarding, injurious speculation, and waste.

The bill, however, passed, and later on a price-fixing committee was appointed. The names of that committee were asked for last Saturday, but they were not given, and with the consent of the Senate I shall have them printed in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The names referred to are as follows:

H. A. Garfield, chairman.
Charles J. Barrett, Georgia.
William M. Doak, Virginia.
Eugene E. Funk, Illinois.
Edward F. Ladd, North Dakota.
R. Goodwin Rhett, South Carolina.
J. W. Shorthill, Nebraska.
James W. Sullivan, New York.
L. J. Tabor, Ohio.
Frank W. Taussig, District of Columbia.
Theodore N. Vail, New York.
Henry J. Waters, Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to say that after the committee was appointed the Senators from the wheat-growing States kept in communication with the members of the committee, and I know of my personal knowledge that the representatives of the commission from the wheat-growing States insisted upon a higher price than $2.20 per bushel for wheat. I believe they held out for a higher price just as long as they could. On the day before the price of wheat was fixed a Senator from a wheat-growing State called upon me and said he believed if some action were not taken the price of wheat would be fixed at between $1.65 and $1.75 per bushel. After having secured that information I asked other Senators to join me. They did so, and we called upon the price-fixing authority. The question was thoroughly presented by us, and it was urged that the price of wheat be fixed at its market price when the bill was passed and became a law. That, of course, was not done, but the price, as we all know, was fixed at $2.20 for the 1917 wheat crop.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Was not the market price then nearly $3 a bushel?

Mr. CURTIS. The market price at that time, depending upon the locality, was between $2.50 and $3 a bushel; and I have here a letter, an extract from which I desire to read, showing the disastrous effect of the action of the Food Administration in the case of one farmer at least. I have received hundreds of letters similar to this from the farmers of Kansas, but I will merely read this one, because the others are substantially the same. It is dated September 20, 1917, and in part is as follows:

I just got returns to-day from a 980-bushel car of wheat. It brought me $1.96 a bushel in Kansas City. This wheat was worth from $2.70 to $2.80 a bushel some weeks ago. The taking of this wheat has cost me a cool thousand dollars, and I feel that if I am to furnish the other fellow bread he in turn should furnish me meat at a controlled price.

The food-control law contains this provision—I will simply read a short paragraph from section 14:

To determine, fix, and give public notice of what under specified conditions is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat in order to insure such producers a reasonable profit.

That is the language of the present law. Now, I venture to say that no farmer in the wheat-producing sections where the yield was small, as it was in some parts of Kansas, Oklahoma, and North and South Dakota, has made a single dollar upon his wheat.

I have a letter here from one farmer who had 100 acres in wheat, and here is what he writes:

The food-control bill has worked to the disadvantage of the farmer. On a hundred acres of wheat raised the whole output did not bring enough money to repurchase seed.

In this same connection there is another matter that should be remembered, and that is that the wheat producers were encouraged to thrash their wheat. In my section of the country, if it is discovered in the early spring that there is going to be a short wheat crop, the farmer turns it under and plants some other crop. Last year the farmers were appealed to not to do that, but to let the wheat grow, no matter how small the yield, and to harvest that wheat, and they were assured that they would not lose money by doing so, because the Government and the allies needed the wheat. So, many of the farmers in western Kansas who would have turned their wheat under permitted the crop to grow, thrashed it, and put it upon the market; but the price was fixed, and, instead of getting what they could have received for it some months before they sold it at from $1.65 to $1.96 a bushel.

Mr. President, while I am on this question I should like to read a letter that I received from a substantial farmer of my State, which touches upon another phase of price fixing. It reads as follows, to wit:

There is no reason why hogs and cattle should drop from 30 to 60 cents per hundred in 24 hours and meat sell constantly at increasing prices, nor why I should feed $2.20 corn into hogs and sell them at 18 cents and pay 50 cents for bacon, as I have done in the past year. If there is to be a fixed price for the products of the farm, at which many are losing money and going out of the live-stock business, then why should not prices be fixed on the finished product that everybody has to purchase?

I can make more money selling my corn at $1.25 than I can to feed it to live stock and then sell hogs at 16 cents or cattle at 12 cents per pound on foot.

In the same connection I desire to read, because they are all about alike, one of the many resolutions I have received. It is as follows:

GROVELAND, KANS.

Be it resolved by the members of the Farmers' Union of Groveland, Kans., That since President Wilson has seen fit to fix the price of 1918 crop of wheat at $2 for the local market we urge to you to use all your influence to persuade the administration to also fix a lower price on farm machinery and other commodities the farmer needs.

I insist that if the products of the farm are to have a price fixed upon them in return the farmer is entitled to have a price fixed upon the things that he needs and buys. The wheat farmers would rather sell their wheat in the open market and let the law of supply and demand control.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a letter from Kingfisher, Okla., which shows that the people in that State have the same difficulty in dealing with the different departments here that Senators have. This letter is addressed to Victor Murdock, a member of the Federal Trade Commission, and is as follows:

KINGFISHER, OKLA., December 20, 1917.

Mr. VICTOR MURDOCK,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am informed that you are one of the members of the Federal Trade Commission. I also understand that your commission will investigate the steel and farm-implement manufacturing companies' prices.

I would like very much to get you interested in looking up the implement-manufacturing companies, which is a very important matter. It will not be long until the farmers will have to buy spring implements. I do not see how the implement-manufacturing companies can "get by" with the prices they have put on for 1918. They are most unreasonable and affect the farmer more than any other line. I can not see how the farmer can pay the price.

I am one of the largest dealers in the West in the implement line. I have 12 stores and they carry a full line of implements and farm machinery. We deal direct with the farmer. The implement manufacturers have put from 80 per cent to 125 per cent to the retail dealer. When the retail dealer puts on his profit and the freight, it is going to make very high-priced farm machinery for the farmer to buy.

I would like very much to hear from you in reference to this matter. If there is any information I can give you, I will be very glad to do so.

Yours, very truly,

ED HOCKADAY.

To that letter Mr. Murdock sent the following reply:

WASHINGTON, December 26, 1917.

Mr. ED HOCKADAY,
Kingfisher, Okla.

MY DEAR MR. HOCKADAY: I have your letter of December 20, and I am much interested in your statement in regard to the increased prices which the manufacturers have put upon farm implements. I wish you would give me further details at once.

Let me have specific instances, naming in each case the implement, name of manufacturer, what his price was last year if you can, what this year, and what the price made now is. Any further information that you can offer as to the effect of the increased prices on the retailer as well as the farmer will be of service to me.

I will be obliged to you if you will do this as soon as possible.

Yours, truly,

VICTOR MURDOCK.

On January 1 this gentleman wrote Mr. Murdock, giving him full information; and I will ask permission to print that letter in the RECORD. It is a little too long to read:

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KINGFISHER, OKLA., January 1, 1918.

Mr. VICTOR MURDOCK,
Care Federal Trade Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MURDOCK: I have your letter of the 26th ultimo, replying to mine of the 20th, in reference to the big combine of the implement manufacturers.

All big concerns are on the same basis and have made the same prices: John Deere Plow Co., Emerson-Brantingham Co., Rock Island Plow Co., International Harvester Co., Oliver Plow Co., Parlin & Orendorff Plow Co.

In 1916 they put on a small advance of 10 per cent or 15 per cent, in the early part of 1917 they made several advances, and later they put on 25 or 30 per cent more, making a total of 80 per cent to 125 per cent.

Take, for example, a gang plow; the weight is 700 pounds. The price in 1916 was $53 to $55. The price now is $100 to $105. (The different manufacturers vary a little bit, which is why I say $100 to $105.)

The manufacturers are making their fight on the high-priced steel, claiming they base their price on 3-cent steel. A year or a year and a half ago steel was $1 to $1.15. In a plow they use pig iron, which costs 1½ cents. The majority of it would be steel based on the 3 cents per pound. There would be a small amount of soft center and cast steel, probably 40 or 50 pounds in a gang plow. This would cost more than the 3-cent steel.

Allow the 6 cents per pound for this steel (which, I expect, would cover the cost of manufacture), that would bring it to $42 cost. There is no way in the world, allowing them labor and overhead expense, to entitle them to the amount of $50 advance on this gang plow.

This is only one item. All the farm implements are on the same basis, several items being higher. I feel that if the manufacturers can hold the prices that have been made for 1918 that we will pay enormous profits on the goods we buy.

I have read a good many articles in the Trade Journal written by the manufacturers, also have heard some speeches by representatives of the manufacturers, and they have been very much exaggerated, trying to show the people the cost of their products. I am inclosing you a letter from Mr. Hood, of Pittsburg, Kans., who has eight stores. You can see what he says.

They will all tell you that their sales so far have been larger than ever before. Of course the price being twice as much would make more volume in dollars and cents. Take myself, for example: At this time of year I generally buy 15 carloads of goods. This year I expect to buy about three carloads of goods.

A great many sales made have been for immediate shipment. Others are to be shipped the latter part of January. They are very anxious to make shipments at once. I would like very much to see something done before spring shipments are made.

In the above statement I only spoke of farm implements. Did not include wheat binders. But we will take, for example, a 7-foot wheat binder. In 1916 we paid $120 for a 7-foot binder, including tongue trucks and transport. In the fall of 1916 they advanced $10. In the spring of 1917 they advanced $16, and this fall have advance $57, making a total of $83, costing $203. This is 70 per cent.

I hope this information will be of some benefit to you.

Yours, very truly,

ED HOCKADAY.

In response to that letter Mr. Murdock writes:

WASHINGTON, January 17, 1918.

Mr. ED. HOCKADAY,
Kingfisher, Okla.

MY DEAR MR. HOCKADAY: This is to acknowledge your letter of January 1, in regard to the increased price of farm implements and with the data which I had asked of you. I have been waiting opportunity to get the matter before the commission, which is overloaded with war duties, and in the meanwhile I wish you would keep me informed of all developments as they come to you in this line.

Yours, truly,

VICTOR MURDOCK.

Then, on February 7, Mr. Murdock wrote Mr. Hockaday as follows——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CURTIS. I will ask the Senator to wait until I read this letter:

WASHINGTON, February 7, 1918.

Mr. ED. HOCKADAY,
Kingfisher, Okla.

MY DEAR MR. HOCKADAY: I have your letter of January 31. I took up your former letter with Mr. Hoover and he informed me that the Department of Agriculture is actively handling the question of farm implements and, to avoid duplication of effort, I am sending your letter to them. In the meanwhile, as these things occur to you, write me and I will get them into the hands of the investigators in that department. I realize with you the necessity of expedition.

Yours, truly,

VICTOR MURDOCK.

Now, we all know that if the facts stated in this first letter were true, the Federal Trade Commission had full authority to investigate, and could direct the proper action to be taken; but they turned the letter over to the Food Administration. As I take it, under the first section of the food-administration act, it has full jurisdiction to act; but the Food Administration turns it over to the Agricultural Department, which has no authority at all. But the Agricultural Department closes its letter as follows:

However, if you still feel that some other action is necessary in the matter, it is the writer's opinion that you should take it up with the legislators for, as above stated, this department has no authority in the matter.

After two months, with the Federal Trade Commission having jurisdiction, with the Food Administration having jurisdiction, and then, if these statements are true, with the Department of Justice having the Sherman Act to apply to these people, they are referred back to Congress.

I simply call this to the attention of the Senators, because I believe our constituents are receiving the same kind of treatment that some of us receive when we call upon the departments, and are put off from one place to the other, although they do not refer us back, I believe, to the legislators.

I hope the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma will be agreed to and that the amendment will be adopted. It provides as follows:

The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 2 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2.50 per bushel at the local elevator or the local railway market where such wheat is delivered from the farm where produced.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I rise more particularly to call attention to a few letters I have received from persons interested in farming in my own State and in corroboration of what was so ably said and argued on Saturday by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and in corroboration of what has just been said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. President, when the minimum price of wheat was fixed by law for the 1918 crop conditions were altogether different from what they are now; and when the price-fixing committee fixed the price of $2.20 a bushel for the 1917 crop conditions were altogether different from what they are now. When the act fixing the price of $2 was passed and when the price-fixing committee fixed the price for the 1917 crop at a maximum of $2.20 a bushel there was no adequate appreciation of the changed conditions since that time. There was no thought, I think, that the price of barley and of rye and of oats would rise to such high figures, and thus afford an inducement for the farmer to sow his land to these grains rather than to wheat; and wheat, as we understand, is the great desideratum.

In addition to that, Mr. President, the price of farm labor and what it would be for the year 1918 was hardly considered, and farmers now find themselves obliged to pay from $75 to $100 a month for farm help in South Dakota.

Another thing that I do not think was understood or quite appreciated was the tremendously increased price of farm machinery; and I shall call attention to a letter that describes the rise in price in various kinds of farm machinery.

So this seems to be the situation: We fixed the price by law in the first place according to certain conditions that then existed. It was an artificial price, a minimum price.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator ought to qualify that statement a little bit so as to differentiate between years. There is a general impression that we fixed the price that exists now. Of course we did not fix in Congress the price of the 1917 crop, but we fixed the minimum price for the 1918 crop, which will not be harvested until the coming summer.

Mr. STERLING. So I understand; and I thought I had made myself plain in regard to that. The price-fixing committee fixed the price for the 1917 crop, and we fixed by statute the price for the 1918 crop at $2.

Mr. NORRIS. The minimum price.

Mr. STERLING. The minimum price. So Congress and the price-fixing authorities were governed by the conditions as they thought they saw them when these prices were fixed.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do not think it ought to be stated that we fixed a minimum price. We did not fix any price at all. We simply said to the farmers: "We want you to sow wheat. Now, it may be that there will be peace throughout the world before the crop has been harvested; and to assure you that you shall not lose we will guarantee that you shall have not less than $2 a bushel." We did not fix anything. We left it to be determined by the law of supply and demand unless something should happen that would drive the price down below $2, and in such a case we said we would guarantee that the price would be at least $2.

Mr. STERLING. I accept the Senator's qualification and explanation of my statement. It was a guaranteed minimum price.

Now, Mr. President, to refer to the letters I have here, depicting conditions in my own State, I read several extracts from these letters.

A gentleman, who is a prominent farmer in northwestern South Dakota, writes me as follows:

Also the price of rye has reached a price never heard of before of $2.40 per bushel on our market to-day, which makes it over $2.50 on the Chicago market, which makes this cereal above its market value as to the value placed upon wheat. I sincerely trust that the board on prices will get busy and not waste so much valuable time in setting a fixed price on everything, as I believe it is just to do so, as long as they have set it on a few things.

Farm labor is another thing that begins to have a serious face to it. Laboring men throughout this part of the country holding from $75 to $100 per month, with board and washing. I think this should have a fixed price of not over a certain amount. These are serious times and serious things to deal with here at home, as our lands will not all be farmed if we can not get the help to do it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. How does the Senator think that the farmers are going to get labor, when a lot of foolish boards and agencies and instrumentalities of the Government are advertising for men for various activities, promising wages that are entirely disproportionate to the services rendered, and wages of such a character as to increase very much more than it ought to be increased the cost to the Government of some of the work that is being performed?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know that I can answer the question of the Senator from Utah in that respect. I am hardly discussing that proposition; but we are confronted with the condition of a very high price demanded for labor, the immediate question being as to whether or not Congress should allow a price of $2.50 a bushel for wheat in order in some way to compensate the farmer for the extraordinary price he has to pay for farm labor under existing conditions.

Mr. GORE and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield, and to whom?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that on more than one occasion the coal operators have been permitted to increase the price of coal, or, rather, the Coal Administration, at the instance of organized labor, has recommended an increase in the wages of miners, and in order to meet that increase it has authorized the coal-mine operators to increase the price of coal in order that the operators might reimburse themselves for the increased wages of their employees.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly. I think the Senator's observation is very pertinent to the question.

I read from another letter:

The Government has set the price of farm products to a certain degree, and I think they should go further, but when doing this they should take into consideration the fact that the farmer is subject to the loss of his crop by the elements, over which he has no control; and at this time, when the cost of operation is so high, he should be protected by some plan of insurance by the Government up to the cost of operation at least, not for the farmer's protection alone, but for the protection of the Government itself, for if the farmer hesitates to put his whole acreage and equipment into operation for fear of a lack of help or losses by the elements, it would be a calamity to the whole Nation and the world.

I do not say, Mr. President, that I approve of some of the suggestions contained in these letters; but they give us some idea of what the farmer is thinking about, and the situation which induces him to think of these solutions for this vexed problem.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I observe that the Senator called attention to the fact that the farmer was encouraged by the Government to plant a larger acreage.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator whether or not a much larger acreage was planted under that inducement?

Mr. STERLING. I can not say exactly what the situation was in my State last year in regard to a larger acreage. I think that the acreage was materially increased last year, but it was due for the most part to the high market price—a price higher than that fixed by the price-fixing committee.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It was larger than it would have been without that assurance, at least.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, I think I can answer that question with respect to the wheat acreage of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. I shall be pleased to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As the result of the campaign for increasing the wheat acreage, the acreage planted in 1917 was increased two million and odd acres over that of 1916. Those figures are only approximate, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is exactly the information I wanted to obtain.

Mr. STERLING. I thank the Senator for the information he has just furnished.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from New York, I am sure, means that the winter sowing in the fall of 1916, together with the spring sowing in 1917, amounted to an increase of something more than 2,000,000 acres over and above the planting for the harvest of 1916; but the fall sowing in 1917, the acreage sown last fall, did not show a very substantial increase. In fact, it was about the same as voluntarily sown in 1914.

The Department of Agriculture made a drive last summer to secure the sowing of 47,000,000 acres of winter wheat to be harvested in 1918. They fell 5,000,000 acres short of the mark they had set. They secured the sowing of 42,170,000 acres, according to their estimate, whereas the farmers in 1914 voluntarily sowed, without any campaign, 42,012,000 acres.

I emphasize the fact that the department's estimate for the fall sowing of 1917 is 42,170,000 acres. I question whether the facts will justify the estimate; and I base that doubt on two facts: One is that they place the estimate of fall sowing in Kansas for 1917 and for 1916 at exactly the same number of acres—a coincidence that would not happen once in a thousand years. I say that impeaches the estimate. But what is still more significant, the department's estimate issued in December last gave the winter sowing for New York at 512,000 acres. The authorities of New York are now completing a census; it is 90 per cent completed; and if the remaining 10 per cent runs true with the preceding 90 per cent, there was sown in New York last fall, after the drive on the part of the Agricultural Department, only 361,000 acres, whereas the department's estimate places it at 512,000 acres. If that falling off prevails throughout the country, we are looking disaster in the face.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him once more?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I made an error in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire. The increase in 1917, compared with the figures of 1916, was not due to any campaign. It occurred before any campaign was started. It occurred before we went into the war, and was the natural increase following an increase in the price of wheat.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When wheat became $2.50 or $3 a bushel, 2,000,000 acres more were planted by the farmers. When wheat is reduced in price, less will be planted.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. GORE. In 1916, 3,000,000 acres of rye were sown. The department made a drive to secure 5,000,000 acres. As a matter of fact, the estimate of 6,000,000 acres that we have is an increase of 100 per cent. There was no limitation on the price of rye.

Mr. STERLING. Reading further from this letter and for the purpose of emphasizing the point that the price of wheat should not be less than $2.50 a bushel to the farmer, under the conditions in order that he may be made to sow and raise with it, and for that purpose only:

> I think you will appreciate the fact I am not addressing you from a personal standpoint, but have been inspired by local conditions.
> Farm laborers are asking from $80 to $90 per month, and the farmers, many of them, are saying they will try and get along without help, just put in what they can themselves. You know what this would mean if it should be general. I have not tried to crystallize my thoughts into form, but to give you a general idea of how I see the situation.

Then another, and this is from a farm-elevator manager in the northwestern part of the State. He says:

> When the Government put a price of $2 per bushel on the 1918 wheat crop it was with the idea that it would stimulate production in that particular crop. Now, the price of other grain has advanced to such an extent that farmers are very seriously considering putting in barley and oats as a main crop instead of wheat.
> Barley at $1.80 here and oats at 85 cents are far more profitable to raise than wheat at $2 per bushel Minneapolis.

I have a letter in my office now which says in Clark County, S. Dak., a few days ago rye was selling at $3 per bushel at Chicago or Minneapolis, I have forgotten which, but leaving the price to the producer in Clark County, S. Dak., at $2.82 a bushel.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, because he is speaking of prices——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. REED. I want to call attention to the fact that these prices for rye and barley and corn which he has spoken of prevail in Canada as well as in this country, showing that the price is not an abnormal one here, but that it is a world price where it is uninterfered with.

For instance, on March 8 at Manitoba No. 2 oats were selling at 99½ cents and American corn at $2.05 on the track at Toronto. At Ontario oats were selling at 99 cents and $1, barley was selling at $1.78 to $1.80, rye was selling at $2.35.

At the same time these remarkable prices prevailed for barley and oats and rye it will be observed that the wheat prices of Canada were substantially the wheat prices in this country, namely, No. 1 northern at Manitoba was $2.23½, which is substantially the price here, the reason for the wheat prices of Canada and the wheat prices of this country being the same. There is a control of wheat in Canada operating in conjunction with the control of wheat in this country.

If the Senator will pardon one further observation, of course the condition in Canada, where these high prices are being paid, as well as in this country, is a further inducement to the farmers of the country to plant something besides wheat.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly. I thank the Senator for his statement and for the figures that he has put in the RECORD. I think he is correct in the conclusion he has drawn therefrom.

Reading further from this letter:

> We have shipped around 100,000 bushels of wheat of the 1917 crop, and many of our best farmers are very seriously thinking of selling most of their seed wheat and sowing barley instead. And you can't very well blame them, for most farmers will try and work for their financial interests regardless of what is best for the country at large.

I do not quite indorse that statement of the farmer just made; it is too broad; the farmers are more patriotic than the statement would imply; but of course there will be the financial interest, and in many instances it will be a case of necessity on the part of the farmer that he should sow his land to these other grains rather than to wheat.

> What the solution to this problem is I do not know, but something should be done to assure the farmer as much or a little more for his labor in raising a wheat or bread crop as for a feed crop.
> Another thing that confronts us is this: There will be a shortage of hogs unless there can be a price fixed between pork on the hoof and corn, so that the farmer can afford to feed his hogs to market conditions. I know of several farmers living west of here who have from 12 to 20 good brood sows and who have just about decided to sell off slick and clean, saying their corn will bring them more money to sell than to feed. Fair corn here is bringing from $1.30 to $1.40 per bushel and hogs 15 cents. Could you go with me for a visit through our local stock yards and see the immature, poorly fattened hogs you would be convinced that something should be done at once.
> To my mind the slogan should be "stimulate the production of foodstuffs in every possible way. Unless there is some action taken at once next year will see wheat and hogs practically off of the market in this locality.

The references in this letter which I have just read have been in part to the price of labor. I will just read a short extract from a letter received this morning which refers to the price of farm implements. The writer figures that $5 to $7 a day will be demanded during harvest for harvest labor unless some action is taken on this matter by Congress.

He says:

> This may not interest you in the least. No doubt you have your hands full and your mind fully taxed with the serious problems of war, but to us farmers whose sons are at the front and who has the prices fixed on his crops by the Government. It is of much concern to us; I believe it would be only fair for the Government to set a price on farm labor as well as to fix prices for farm products.

I say in regard to this statement, as I said in regard to the previous statement, without at all indorsing what he has said here in regard to the conscription of labor for the farms, hardly thinking as yet it can be done; yet it shows what is in the farmer's mind and how his condition and his circumstances lead him to think of these things.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are a few hundred of these laborers now scattered around Sand Point in Idaho, and they are spending their time at present in making rushes on jails to get their comrades out of jail who have been arrested. There are plenty of those kind, but even if we would get them on the farms it would take a regiment to make them work.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly. And the writer of this letter alludes to how impossible labor of that kind would be for the farm.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. STERLING. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am going to ask the Senator a question along a line that I know is not popular in the Congress of the United States, and perhaps not in the country. I submitted a resolution which went to the Committee on Agriculture asking that committee to make inquiry as to the advisability of so amending the Chinese exclusion act that we might have, under careful restrictions and regulations, some farmers from northern China, who are said to be very excellent farmers, brought into this country to supply to some extent the demand on the part of the farmers for labor during the continuance of the war. I have information that there are parties who are ready to bring a very large number of real farmers from China under very strict regulations, even holding up one-half their pay, depositing it in bank, and guaranteeing that they shall be returned to their home country at the close of the war. Does the Senator think that that is a matter worthy of any consideration on the part of Congress?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from New Hampshire that, without committing myself to the proposition at all, I think it is a matter worthy of the earnest consideration of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state——

Mr. STERLING. As I understand the proposition, if the Senator will permit me, it is that 800,000 farmers from north central China be brought to this country. The situation is this: They desire experience here upon farms in order that they may learn farm methods and the use of farm machinery in this country, and they are ready to enter into a contract for one, two, or three years, or until the termination of the war, and then return to China. This labor is altogether distinct, as I understand it, from Chinese coolie labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely distinct. I am very glad to have the Senator's opinion, because, being fully conscious of the fact that there is this intense prejudice against the importation of oriental labor in any form, I have become very greatly interested in this matter, and fully believe that it is a remedy we might, as a war-emergency act, adopt—and most of our legislation is based on that fact, and relieve this situation, which is becoming very alarming, so far as farm labor is concerned, because whatever price we put on wheat or any other commodity, if you can not get men to sow the seed and harvest the wheat the price will be of mighty little consequence.

Mr. STERLING. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for calling attention to this matter. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not know whether any allusion has been made to this statement or not, but I am surprised at the reports from various parts of the country, not only what the Senator is reading but what comes to my office, in view of official statements made here in Washington. I call attention to a report made this morning in the public press, in which it is said:

"Hysterical and exaggerated statements" as to shortage of farm labor and the unfitness of boys for this work are doing great harm, officials of the Federal Employment Service said yesterday.

The only department of the Government that speaks with authority on this question says that the farmers are becoming hysterical and exaggerated in their statements. I have letters in great profusion on my table and in my files in the last 30 days from farmers whom I never knew to have hysterics in my life. They are hard-headed fellows. I never knew them to willfully exaggerate. Possibly they are not informed of actual circumstances in the farm communities, but I would like the Senator from South Dakota to state what he thinks of these official utterances compared with the men who are doing the work and raising the grain. Who is right?

Mr. STERLING. I think, Mr. President, the official statements referred to by the Senator from Illinois are contrary to the actual facts as they exist. He speaks about the credibility of the men with whom he has had correspondence and who have written him in regard to the situation as it pertains to farm labor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I believe each and every one of the men who have written to me here would rather underestimate than overestimate the bad conditions that exist. They are level-headed, conservative men. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the position which the Department of Labor takes in regard to the shortage of labor upon the farm is that there is no shortage of labor if a proper distribution of it could be had. I do not understand that the Department of Labor denies the fact that there is in some localities a great shortage of labor—that is easily proven—and that there is a failure so far as we have been unable to distribute the labor of the country in accordance with the demands of the different localities.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator permit me there? Is the Senator able to say whether the Department of Labor itself has adopted any method or is following any plan in regard to the distribution of farm labor?

Mr. BORAH. I am not able to say what the plans are or what the details connected with that proposition are, but I am told both in the public press and privately that they have been working out some plan. I do not know what the details are.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from Idaho is somewhat mistaken in the conclusion he draws from the statement read by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. The statement of the Senator from Illinois is to the effect that there is a shortage of farm labor. It may be true, as the Senator from Idaho has stated, that the report of the Department of Labor shows there is no shortage of labor, but general labor is somewhat different from farm labor. The Senator from Idaho knows as well as I do, and the rest of us here, that farm labor has become skilled labor. It takes skilled labor to perform all kinds of labor upon the farm.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Dakota misunderstood me. The Senator from Idaho did not express an opinion as to the fact in regard to the matter. I was simply stating what I understood to be the position of the Department of Labor—that it did not deny the shortage of labor in certain localities, and so forth, but claimed that there was plenty of labor throughout the country, even farm labor, if it was properly distributed.

Mr. GRONNA. That is exactly the way I understood the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Dakota said the Senator from Idaho stated that there was no shortage of labor. That the Senator from Idaho did not say.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from North Dakota heard what the Senator from Idaho said. He said that the Department of Labor stated that there was no shortage of labor. The article which the Senator from Illinois read was to the effect that there was no shortage of farm labor. I think we are beginning to realize that every man who may be able to do ordinary labor can not work upon a farm and perform a good day's work with the intricate machinery we have. I think we ought to begin to draw a distinction between skilled farm labor and such labor as was referred to by my good friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not see how anybody can contend that there is no shortage of labor, in view of the fact that 2,000,000 men have been drafted and are in the service of the United States. Evidently they have been withdrawn from the avenues of labor. For that reason it seems to me the department must clearly be mistaken as to the fact that there is not a shortage of labor in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I am not undertaking to argue that the Department of Labor is not in error, though I think a very strong argument could be made in support of the Department of Labor when you take into consideration the fact that there are thousands of people in the United States now who are not performing any labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from South Dakota permit me just a word?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. When I made the suggestion in the form of a resolution that went to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that we might find relief in another direction, the Department of Labor—and I have an impression it came directly from the Secretary—informed me that the movement I had inaugurated or suggested was unnecessary, because the department, through the Federal Employment Bureau, was formulating plans that, in the opinion of the Department of Labor, would fully meet the requirement of the farmers of the country so far as labor was concerned. I had hoped that that would eventuate, but I have waited some weeks now; and while I am not as much interested in this question as the Senators who come from great agricultural States, I have watched in vain for any evidence that any good result had as yet been wrought out by the department.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, does he not understand that the Department of Labor has in contemplation the sending of "city folks" out on farms, inexperienced, and knowing nothing whatever about farm labor?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is true. That is one of the matters that I tried to direct my attention to years ago, in the hope that some system might be devised, either through the Immigration Bureau or in some other way, to secure a distribution of the immigrants who come into this country, but it has proved an impossible thing to do. They congregate in New York, Boston, and Chicago, and the other great cities of the country and refuse to go on the farms. I suppose it is impossible to make them go there, and if we did I apprehend they would be of mighty little use as far as practical farming is concerned. I think that is exactly the idea the department had in mind when the suggestion was made that labor could be secured for the farms of the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the discussion here makes quite pertinent another sentence or two from this letter, which I came near omitting. This writer says:

> Farm hands are scarce, some demanding $100 a month for farm labor. This man I hired is only a common farm laborer; can not run a tractor or steam engine or thrashing engine. Seventy-five dollars a month is a common price asked. If we farmers are going to start at $50 to $100 for spring work, what will the demand be for harvest hands and help? I figure that $5 to $7 a day will be demanded unless some action is taken on this matter by Congress.

The letter further states:

> I believe it would be only fair for the Government to set a price on farm labor as well as to fix prices for farm products. The Government conscripts our boys and sets the price. Why not conscript labor for the farm and set the price? Grain binders are $250 this year; last year, $180. Manure spreaders, $250; last year, $125. Prices seem to have been all arranged for the farmer. Shall we farmers bear most of the burdens of war?

So, Mr. President, under the conditions relative to prices of farm labor and the prices of these other grains which the farmer will substitute in sowing for wheat that he ought to sow, it seems to me that we can do no less than adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], providing for a price of $2.50 a bushel at the local markets.

Mr. President, in price fixing we should have regard to the highest normal cost of production as a basis for such price fixing. We should take into consideration not the lowest normal cost of production where there are the great facilities, the larger farms, and perhaps better methods of farming, which will enable the farmer to produce grain at a lower price, but we must take into consideration the average farmer, the man who most probably is obliged to hire some help, and who is not able within his own family to provide all the help that he will need for the operation of his farm. I sincerely hope that this amendment will prevail.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I simply desire to contribute a few words to this most interesting discussion. I think, if we study the situation carefully, we shall come to the conclusion that the price fixing on wheat has been an abject failure. If we study the history of attempts at price fixing which have been made throughout the world we shall find that they also have been utter failures.

Now, let me call your attention, Mr. President, to the existing situation. Before we adopted the legislation under which a price was fixed last year on wheat, all cereals—wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye, and flax—were sold in the open market on the boards of the grain exchanges. The price was governed to some extent by the law of supply and demand. What did we do last year? We segregated wheat from all other cereals, and we said in respect to that one cereal, "We will fix an arbitrary price for wheat that you can not exceed, but for which you must sell your crop." What was the result? The result of the fixing of that arbitrary price on wheat was to enhance the price of other cereals. Corn, rye, barley, and oats have gone up until the prices of most of those cereals—in fact, all of them—to-day exceed the price of wheat.

Take even the price of oats at 99 cents and a dollar a bushel. There are only 32 pounds of oats in a bushel, while there are 60 pounds in a bushel of wheat. So, for feed or food purposes, either for man or beast, it takes two bushels of oats to equal a bushel of wheat.

Barley is to-day as high in price as is wheat, and even higher; rye is a good deal higher—50 per cent higher; and corn also is higher. What is the effect of this? I want to give you a concrete case to show how like a kicking gun it operates. I have a letter here from Mr. A. C. Hatch, a prominent merchant, who has been engaged in the grain business for many years, who lives in Otter Tail County, Minn., which is one of the largest agricultural counties in the State, a county consisting of 63 townships. Mr. Hatch tells me how this operates. Oats, barley, and corn are so high in price that the farmers, instead of using those cereals with which to feed their live stock, are grinding their wheat and using that for feed. Mr. Hatch states in his letter:

> Now, further, on Saturday, March 9, at the Herness farm there were 44 bushels of wheat ground for feed; at the Luhmys farm, in Ottertail Township, there were 100 bushels ground for feed, and in the town of Maine over 200 bushels of wheat.

People must have something with which to feed their live stock in order to keep it from starving; and if wheat is cheaper than oats, if it is cheaper than barley, if it is cheaper than corn, the farmer who needs feed will take his wheat and grind that instead of going into the market and buying oats and corn and rye and barley for feed purposes. That is the way it is operating.

Price fixing, even if you put the price of wheat at $2.50 a bushel—and I shall probably vote for that—will prove, Mr. President, an abject failure. The only fair way is to leave all of these cereals to be sold in the open market, to be governed by the law of supply and demand. Then the wheat farmer will get the real market value of his wheat as much as he is to-day getting the real market value of his corn, of his oats, of his rye, and of his barley. You should either do that or else you must adopt the arbitrary method of fixing the price of all these cereals. If you are going to fix the price on wheat in order to preserve the equilibrium and prevent the farmers from grinding their wheat for feed, you must fix a standard minimum price for corn, for oats, for barley, and for rye in order to put them on a parity.

What would be the result of the method which we are pursuing? I have received numerous letters from farmers, from grain dealers, and from other men who are versed in these things, who have called my attention to these matters. I have brought these communications time and time again to the attention of the Food Administration and to the attention of the Agricultural Department, and I have received from them only the vaguest and most indefinite kind of answers, which have indicated to me that they utterly fail to understand the situation.

I think the result of the present system will be that in the spring wheat States in the Northwest there will be a greater acreage of corn, a greater acreage of barley, and I know of my own knowledge that last fall there was a greater quantity of fall rye—winter rye, as we call it—seeded in the spring wheat States than ever before.

I believe it is true of North Dakota, as I know it is true of Minnesota, that more winter rye has been sown than ever, and the farmers will sow more barley and more flax than heretofore for two reasons: First, because those crops will bring them a much better income per acre, and, in the next place, at this moment they need feed for their stock and for their hogs. So if it comes to a question of buying dear corn or dear barley or dear rye, dearer and higher proportionately than wheat, the farmers are going to take their wheat and grind it and use it for feed. I have known such things to occur in normal times in years gone by, when there was a disproportion in the prices of these cereals.

So, Mr. President, even if we adopt this amendment, even if we fix a price of $2.50 a bushel, to my mind it will not cure the situation, so long as we leave the door open in respect to the other cereals. We shall still be confronted by the existing situation, because the demand for the other cereals and the market price for them will continue to fluctuate and to rise and rise, as it has done in recent times.

Why, Mr. President, may I ask, should the wheat farmer be segregated and made the one victim of price fixing? It passes my understanding; it baffles my comprehension. We can segregate the wheat farmer from all the other farmers; we can fix the price of wheat; but, as I said a moment ago, such action will prove like a kicking gun, because the farmer is going to raise the crop that he finds most profitable; and, I repeat, instead of taking his oats, his barley, and his rye and feeding them to the stock he will sell them, because they bring a higher price, and he will grind his wheat to feed his stock.

Such a condition is to my mind intolerable. There is only one of two courses to adopt: One is to leave the market open for wheat, as it is in the case of other cereals; and the other, which I regard as dangerous, but still much fairer than the present system, is to make an arbitrary price for all the other cereals. Mr. President, as I said at the outset, I have no faith in any method of price fixing; but if there is to be price fixing, in order to preserve an equilibrium between wheat and the other grains, what in common parlance are called the coarse grains, the price of them all ought to be fixed, or they ought all to be sold in the open market.

These are my views, Mr. President. I do not care to enter into a discussion of the labor question more than to say this: The Department of Labor and those affiliated with it have taken occasion to go into the labor situation. There have been a great many strikes and a great many disputes in regard to labor, which have been settled in the main by increasing wages in all directions. I am not finding fault with that; perhaps, in many instances such increases may have been just; but the increasing of wages in the other callings where labor is organized into unions and where men work in factories, in shops, and in shipyards, so that a man engaged in ordinary labor can earn from $8 to $12 a day for 10 hours of work, reacts upon the prices that the farmer is compelled to pay for his labor.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the farmer knows no eight-hour day; he knows no time and a half for overtime. The farmer, in order to be successful, must start early in the morning. The first thing he must do at the beginning of each day is to do what are called his chores; he must feed his horses and his pigs, milk his cows and harness his horses, and when all that preliminary work has been done he goes in and takes his breakfast. Then, after breakfast, he goes out in the fields to do his work. At evening, when he quits work in the fields, he comes home, when he must unharness the horses, must water and feed them, and must feed his pigs and milk his cows. The laborer from the large cities—and farmers have tried it—when employed on the farm does not want to stir an inch before breakfast. Oh, no; he wants to lie in bed until the breakfast gong beats, and then he will come down, halting and limping, and eat a generous breakfast. Then he will start out to work; but he will not stir an inch before that time. When evening comes, the moment he comes home with the team from the fields he wants to quit and go in to eat his supper. Even where it is customary, as is the case among well-to-do farmers during the rush season, to give a lunch in the field at 10 o'clock in the forenoon and to give a lunch at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, these city chaps when they come home in the evening with their teams from the fields feel they are doing a great thing if they take the harness from the horses, lead them to the water tank, and give them a bit of hay; but if they do that much, that is the ultimate limit; you do not catch a mother's son of them milking a cow or feeding a pig or doing anything else in the way of work. The farmer can not get along with that kind of labor. Then, even when you get them in the field, most of them are of no account. That is the difficulty we are confronted with.

We hear much talk about the distribution of labor and how labor is being mobilized. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, which has been investigating the operations of the Shipping Board. We thought they were paying pretty high wages in some of the shipyards. Senators, of course, have heard of Hog Island, which has figured in the public press and in the public eye. Among the witnesses who appeared before us a few days ago was a man who called himself an "industrial engineer." I had never heard of the term before, and so it struck me as a novelty. I inquired what the functions of an industrial engineer were. He replied: "It is the business of an industrial engineer to educate and mobilize labor; to get it to work together in harmony; to bring labor in from sources where there is plenty of it, and to put it to good use." That is an "industrial engineer."

Well, now, I wish to God they would send an industrial engineer among us farmers who could mobilize farm labor, educate it, drill it, and make it so that it would be useful to the ordinary American farmer.

Why, Mr. President, I had an experience along this line some years ago, I think away back in 1893, when we had a sympathetic strike, and a great many laborers were floating through the country looking for work. We got a good many of the kind my friend from North Dakota has been referring to. One day a gang of about six or seven men came to my farm. It was at a time when labor was abundant and work was scarce. I had a lot of land that I wanted grubbed, a good deal of which I was letting out by the acre. These fellows came along and said that they had gotten stranded out West and were looking for work. "Well," I said, "I have work. I have a lot of grubbing to be done." I took them over and showed them the patch, where I had 8 or 10 men working. They were working by the acre, so much an acre for grubbing. They said, "Your terms are all right, and we will go to work, but we have not any money. Can you buy us tools?" I invested about $10 or $12 in tools; and they went over there and grubbed about half a day. Then at noon they came back to see me with long, very sober faces, and said, "Here, we don't like to work in this way, by the job. The way for you to do, Mr. NELSON, is to hire 20 or 30 men to grub, and then put a boss over them. We like to work under a boss. We don't like to work by the acre." I said, "I can not do that. I have not enough land, and can not afford to hire 20 or 30 men and put a boss over them. That would be too expensive." They said, "Well, unless you do that, unless you will hire a gang of 20 or 30 men and a boss, we don't want to undertake the work. We can do a good deal where we have a good boss." I went over and looked at what those six men had done all forenoon over on the lot, and they had done about as much work as a single, decent man would have done in two hours. So I let the crew go.

That is a sample of the kind of work we get on the farm; and I hope, Mr. President, that these reformers—and they are around us on all sides—will take into account, among other things, the matter of providing the farmers with industrial engineers, to help us to mobilize and get the right kind of farm labor to enable us to raise crops.

The farmer is handicapped by three things. The first is the extraordinary rise in the cost of farm implements and farm machinery. The second is the extraordinary rise in the price of labor, and the scarcity of the right kind of labor. The third is this price-fixing scheme, which, God knows, is the worst of all. We could survive if they would leave the farmer with an open and free market for his products, as in normal times we survived all these other pests, as we have survived the grasshopper, the hailstone, and every other calamity that Providence and the climate have visited upon our country.

In conclusion, Mr. President, while I shall reluctantly, as a matter of sentiment, vote for this proposition, to increase the price of wheat to $2.50 a bushel, if it is not ruled out of order; yet I believe that, even if it is adopted, it will prove an utter failure, and that we shall be confronted with the same situation next year that we are confronted with now under the price-fixing system that we have had during the past year.

I have here the letter of Mr. Hatch, to which I have referred. I will not take up the time of the Senate in reading it, but I will ask to have it printed as a part of my remarks:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Without objection, that order will be made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

BATTLE LAKE, MINN., March 13, 1918.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The beautiful system of food supply is working fine in this county. With price of wheat and coarse grains as it now is, wheat is getting decidedly the worst of it. With barley at $3 for 60 pounds, oats at 89 cents, corn meal out of sight, precious wheat, which, it is said, the allies need, is out of it.

The facts as to this county, and which will hold for the whole Northwest, is this: Barley is being held for seed; all spring rye has already been bought up for seed; the acreage of oats will be heavy; all at the expense of wheat. It is a hard matter to buy flax for seed. I want 50 bushels myself, but don't know where I can get it. All this is at the expense of wheat acreage. Now, further, Saturday, March 9, at the Herness farm there was 44 bushels wheat ground for feed; at Luhmys, in Ottertail Township, over 100 bushels; at Maine over 200 bushels. Those are all that I know of, but I am certain of this, that 2 pounds of wheat to-day are fed to stock for every pound to humanity. This is getting a very favorable result, isn't it? Now, is it imbecility or disloyalty that is causing this condition? You are in a position to find out.

Nonpartisans are advocating less acreage of wheat and are making lots of capital out of present conditions and are gaining ground fast in this county. The marketing of barley has caused several temperance men to join the league lately, which I think will give the league a clean sweep in the legislature in this county.

Say, can't something be done, and done now.

Respectfully,

A. C. HATCH.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have never been able to bring my mind to the conclusion that price fixing was desirable under any circumstances; and I am gratified to have the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]—a great lawyer and a successful farmer—declare in this presence that price fixing, so far as wheat is concerned, has been an abject failure. It occurred to me at the time it was undertaken that it was a grotesque experiment that at best would result in failure of some kind, and I am satisfied that the Senator from Minnesota speaks words of truth and soberness when he says it was an abject failure.

It seemed to me at that time, and it seems to me now, that if we are going to start price fixing in this country it ought to be broadened very much beyond wheat. I am not sure that we ought not to include agricultural products that are not so intimately connected with the war emergency as are wheat and other edible products of the farms; but, as I stated in the beginning, I have never brought myself to believe in the system at all, and do not believe in it now, and I think it ought to be abandoned absolutely and forever. It has been tried in other countries. France tried it, and it proved a failure. It was tried in this country at a former period in our history, and it proved a failure.

In that connection, Mr. President, I am going to ask that the Secretary be permitted to read one paragraph from the speech delivered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in this Chamber on the 27th day of February last, which deals with this very question. I have marked the paragraph, and ask that the Secretary read it, after which I shall occupy only one moment of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In this connection I am going to cite Gustave Le Bon, who is one of the great scientific men of France, a distinguished biologist and also a publicist. Some of his books on psychology are very well known—for instance, one which he wrote some years ago, which was translated into many languages, called The Psychology of the Crowd. He wrote another book called The Psychology of Education, and another The Psychology of Politics, and still another Of Socialism. He has made a very elaborate study of the mental operations of masses of men in contradistinction to the individual mind. He has published recently another book, Les Premieres Conséquences de la Guerre, in which he collects data on the psychologic conditions of the nations engaged in war. Among the many things operating upon the public mind of which Mr. Le Bon treats is the price fixing which took place in France and in this country at the close of the eighteenth century. He lays great emphasis on the reversion to the old ideas of the French Revolution, and he points out in his citations of authorities the effects on the price of sugar, among other articles, both in France and in Germany. The authorities he cites all seem to show that price fixing was not successful and was in a large measure abandoned in both countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some of the books to which the Senator from Massachusetts called attention in that paragraph are worthy of our attention. It was my privilege to scan The Psychology of the Crowd, and it contains information that certainly is important to any student of the existing condition in this country as well as the existing condition throughout the world.

Mr. President, it occurs to me that if we are going to fix prices, if we are going into that business to fix either minimum or maximum prices in this country for the products of the farm, we ought to enlarge it. Why should we not include hay? True, that is not consumed by human beings, but it is consumed by animals that contribute very largely to war conditions in Europe and contribute very largely to the comfort and happiness of mankind. In the little State of New Hampshire last year we raised 683,000 tons of hay, and in New England as a whole 5,085,000 tons of hay. The farmer in the Northwest—and he has reason for it—complains that he is not getting enough for his wheat to warrant him in raising it. Why, the hay that we raised in New Hampshire last year did not pay for putting it in the barn, and the result is that our barns throughout New England are crowded with hay for which there is no market. If we are going to fix a price on any agricultural product that will enable the farmer to raise it at a profit, I do not know why we should not extend our vision to New England and take care of our hay crop.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield; certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there not a large distinction there? Your hay crop is not a planted crop. It very often grows on ground that will not sustain a planted crop; and is not the Senator mistaken in saying that the farmer complains in regard to the price of wheat? The farmer is not complaining. He is simply refusing to raise wheat and is raising more profitable crops; and it is the country that is going to complain. We are going to complain, because we will not have an adequate supply of wheat for ourselves and to send to France and Great Britain.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, my hearing has been defective if I have not understood that Senators have, in behalf of the farmer, made complaint of the price that he is getting for his wheat at the present time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think that is a very mistaken view to take of it. It seems to me that we need only to read the papers to see that a grave emergency exists because an inadequate supply of wheat is being raised; and it is we, who are responsible for supplying wheat not only to our own people but to France and to Great Britain and Europe, who should bestir ourselves to find a way to stimulate a larger production of wheat. We are doing all we can to abstain from the use of wheat, but we ought to take the more intelligent course and do something to stimulate its production. I have letters on my desk showing that in Nebraska, Iowa, and Illinois this year not over 75 per cent of the normal wheat crop will be raised. Why is it? Largely because the farmers are raising things which will pay them more per acre, and that is a very serious situation.

It is not the farmer that is complaining; it is the people who have got to use the wheat who will be complaining.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I quoted the Senators from the great wheat sections of this country and they did complain, and I quoted them correctly. Now, I do differentiate between the necessity for wheat and the necessity for other products that are not so directly connected with our war emergency situation; but, nevertheless, I do say that if we are going into the practice of adopting the system of price fixing in this country, it ought to be very largely extended beyond one product of the farm.

I know of no reason why we should not fix the price of cotton. It brought 6 cents a pound not many years ago and it brings 35 cents a pound now, I think; and it is very essential to the manufacture of munitions of war. Why not fix the price on that, and either benefit the raisers of cotton, or, on the other hand, benefit the people who use cotton, the large and ever-increasing army of consumers?

So, Mr. President, while I have not fully determined how I shall vote on this proposition, I want to vote intelligently and I want to vote in a way that will increase the wheat product of this country. I have been seeking information as I have gone along by interrogating Senators who know more about it than I do. If I can be persuaded that this amendment will accomplish that result without doing a greater injustice to the army of consumers who use flour, which will be increased in price, I shall vote for it; and I may vote for it, anyway. I am not sure as to that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with a great deal of what the Senator has said about the matter of price fixing. As I understand the Senator, he thinks that the natural laws of supply and demand ought to be allowed to take their course.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was taught that in my school days.

Mr. NORRIS. That is pretty sound doctrine. If it is not manipulated, in the end it will produce the best results. But because the Senator has said—and I know he feels that way—that if there is some reason why this should be an exception he would like to know it, I want to suggest to him something that has had a great deal of influence on me.

The present price of wheat, not by statute but by control of the market by governmental agencies, has been fixed. I do not suppose any one will dispute that. It has been fixed at a price which I think everybody will concede is below what it would have been if the law of supply and demand had run its regular course. As I look at this particular provision, it is in here now because that fundamental law has already been interfered with, and this is an attempt to approach more nearly what would be the result if the law of supply and demand had been allowed to take its course. Now, to my mind that is a reasonable view to take of it. I am led irresistibly to that conclusion, although fundamentally I do not like this idea of fixing a price.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I will ask my friend the Senator from Nebraska a question, to which I know he will give me a candid answer. It is believed that the price fixed on wheat is too low. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think the prices in the markets of the United States at the present time of rye and barley and oats are too high?

Mr. NORRIS. I think they would be lower, without any doubt, if the price of wheat had not been manipulated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. That is exactly the answer I expected from the Senator, because he always gives candid answers. Now, I will ask the Senator, if we are to fix the price on wheat, ought we not logically and properly to fix also the price on barley, rye, and oats?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I suppose logically we would not stop there. Of course, the Senator realizes that that leads us into additional difficulties.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. To my mind we would not be justified in adopting this amendment if the price of wheat had not already been changed from what it would have been if the law of supply and demand had been allowed to prevail.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator a further question. If we should fix the price of rye and barley and oats at a lower point than they are selling for to-day, because they are selling at an abnormal price, would not that stimulate the production of wheat? Would it not be the very best method we could adopt to stimulate the production of wheat?

Mr. NORRIS. It might be, but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the wheat-fixing proposition is of legislative origin, and we can not interfere with that except to take the very thing on which the price has been fixed, and that is wheat.

Mr. GALLINGER. But we could by legislation fix the minimum price of the other articles.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume we could, but, as I said awhile ago, that would lead us into a great many difficulties.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would the Senator advocate limiting the price of oats and barley and rye without also limiting the price of labor that we must use in the production of those grains, and without limiting the price of farm machinery and the price of thousands of articles that the farmer must buy?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, that is a pretty comprehensive question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Should a limitation be placed on one class only?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a comprehensive question that I do not want to answer. I will cross that bridge when I come to it.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator if we are not right to that bridge?

Mr. GALLINGER. We are quite close to it. I know that the farmers in sections of the country where wheat, rye, barley, and oats are not grown, in the industrial sections of the country, where they consume these things and purchase them from the agricultural States, are very much disturbed to-day over the abnormal price, not so much of wheat as of the other products I have named. I called attention to that two or three days ago, and I do not care to repeat it, beyond saying that the average farmer in New England is unable to purchase food for his horses and cattle at the present price. Even the little farmers in the villages and on the farms are actually selling their fowls, sending them to the Boston market, because they can not afford to purchase grain to feed their hens. They are sending them in carloads literally. Hence I say this matter is very difficult of adjustment so as to give it an equitable and fair basis.

Now, I do not want to be put in a false position about this matter and I will not be put in a false position. I want to do everything in my power to increase the acreage of wheat and the production of wheat. I realize as much as any Senator does or as any man in this country does that we have a tremendous contract on our hands. The United States has practically got to fight the European war if it continues two years longer. We have to produce the men, we have to produce the money, we have to produce the food, and they can not fight it without wheat. I understand all that, and I appreciate it all, and I want to do my duty in the matter. Every question I have propounded during the debate on this bill has been for the purpose of endeavoring to get information that would justify my vote, because I want to vote right, and I thank the Senator for having so logically answered the questions I have propounded.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. In connection with the Senator's question touching the price fixing on other agricultural products I will ask the Senator this question. He has had some experience, I believe, in the practice of medicine. If he had a patient who had taken too generous a portion of strychnine I wonder whether he would prescribe more strychnine as an antidote?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is hardly a question. If he had taken too much he would be dead before I could have prescribed anything.

Mr. GORE. If he had passed the danger line but not the dead line, and the question of life and death was still trembling in the balance, would the Senator prescribe more strychnine, and still more? If in fixing the price of wheat we have let one rattlesnake sting the farmer I would doubt the wisdom and efficacy of letting a half dozen rattlesnakes sting him as a remedy.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska says the farmers are not complaining. The Senator from Oklahoma says they have stung the farmer. There is a contradiction between these two who represent the affirmative of this question.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator did not refer to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; the Senator's colleague.

Mr. NORRIS. My colleague is not in the Chamber. I think, if I understood my colleague's reference, he meant, and I think everybody will agree to that proposition, that if there had been no interference with the price of wheat the farmer would not complain, but when the price was fixed and put lower than he could produce other things for, I do not think my colleague meant to say——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is immaterial anyway; but I have said all I care to say on the subject. I confess that the difficulties which have suggested themselves to my mind during this debate have not entirely been cleared away, but I am going to give the matter very careful consideration and I shall vote upon it as I think the best interests of the country demand.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I merely want to state before passing from the discussion of a few moments ago I did not speak to the point as to whether or not the farmers are complaining. I will say, however, the farmer has just occasion to complain whenever he is obliged by his Government or by any other artificial force to sell his products for less than the cost of production unless everybody else is required to do the same thing. I take it the farmers will go as far as any other class, they will make any sacrifice necessary, they will bear any burdens necessary to bring this war to an acceptable conclusion. I believe that of all those who are willing to strip their shirts from their backs to win this war the farmer is among the foremost of that class, but he has a right to insist that others shall be unbuttoning their collars while he is going through that operation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this motion requires for its proper understanding a discussion of the proposed amendment to the pending bill. Hence I assume that a discussion of the amendment will perhaps determine the motion.

The purpose of this proposed amendment is to fix by legislation the price of a necessity of life, and its justification is that it has already been fixed, and fixed too low. If there is any other justification for it, I am unable to perceive what it is.

In the good old days when doctors bled for every ailment it was the practice if the first bleeding resulted in no improvement in the patient's malady nor killed him, then to bleed him again. This bill would seem to be based upon that principle. The Government having established the price of a commodity unsuccessfully, or at least unsatisfactorily, it is now proposed that Congress shall step in and fix a price of its own.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that practice will be any more successful in legislation than it was in medicine, and certainly not unless price fixing be made universal. It might be unsuccessful then, but it will very seriously disturb general economic conditions to single out any commodity or list of commodities and place an arbitrary price upon them, leaving all others to be determined by the uninterrupted play of the law of supply and demand.

Of course, I am aware and the Senate is aware that Executive price fixing has not been entirely confined to wheat. We have a maximum price upon many of the metals, and upon some of the products of some of them which have been fixed by other authority than the Food Commission. The prices fixed for metals have not at this time seriously disturbed industrial conditions, doubtless because at the outset they were fixed at a sufficiently high maximum to allow considerable play of difference between the price and the cost of production. But its success has not yet been determined.

I did not believe when we were discussing the conservation bill, nor do I believe now, that we can successfully regulate prices either by legislation or by the arbitrary, well-considered action of commissions created for that purpose, unless they are applied universally both to the product and to everything which enters into its creation. I thought then that we should legislate to remove all artificial interferences with the law of supply and demand, two or three of which are easily recognized; for example, undue speculation upon the stock exchange, the cornering of a given commodity, or the control of it by some combination which can regulate the product to suit the price which it fixes for public consumption.

I recall offering two or three amendments when the bill was pending to reach those conditions, and by controlling or removing them give free play to the law of supply and demand.

I think, Mr. President, as I did then, that such legislation is essential, wise, temperate, effective legislation. I think also that appeals to the judgment and the patriotism of the people for their contribution and cooperation to the general end are desirable and necessary. Perhaps all genuine conservation thus far attained by the Food Commission has been accomplished through the willing cooperation of the people with it by due observance of their requests and suggestions.

Perhaps there is one other mode of controlling prices. We have frequently been warned to avoid the mistakes of Great Britain since she entered the war and to emulate her successes. She has handled her food problem very well.

Great Britain at the outbreak of the war spent enormous sums of money in securing needed articles of food and wear for her people. She bought millions of bushels of wheat and hundreds of thousands of tons of sugar. She placed an embargo upon the exportation of wool from her colonies to other countries. Having secured large quantities of these very valuable materials, she stored them. The prices she paid for them were a secondary consideration. She used these huge reservoirs to regulate prices by throwing their contents upon the market whenever speculation threatened or prices rose beyond what the Government considered reasonable. Of course, that is an expensive method of controlling prices. The people pay for it by taxation, but it is fairly effective.

I fear, Mr. President, that we may fix prices of given commodities by the commission or by the Congress as long as this war lasts, and the only effect will be to produce the storm of protest and complaint with which we are being overwhelmed by the farmers. It is a lamentable fact that wheat, for which there is a crying and incessant demand, is selling for less money than corn and other grains which in normal times are cheaper than wheat. At the present time, because of their unusual prices, they offer the farmer an irresistible inducement to plant them instead of the wheat, which is needed.

No man with common sense will engage in an unprofitable industry very long nor is there any who will fail to recognize existing conditions and produce that which promises some measure of profit. That is why we have a shortage of wheat acreage. Of course other conditions enter into the problem, but the fundamental one is the difference in prices of grains caused by the existing demand.

These unusual and exorbitant prices for other grains may be unjustifiable. They may be the result of speculation or of the orders of the Food Commission requiring their use as substitutes for wheat, but whatever the cause the markets determine the action of the farmer and of the stock raiser, and all the laws enacted by the Congress can not interfere with or overthrow that natural inclination of mankind.

Hence, I do not believe, Mr. President, that this bill, if it becomes a law, will have any other result than to force the prices of other grains still higher.

Mr. President, it is difficult to successfully interfere with natural laws of production and distribution without creating a disturbance somewhat similar to that which occurs in the human system when suffering from some particular malady. We know what the malady is. It may be local, but it interferes with and interrupts all the normal conditions of the body. They are so interrelated, so dependent upon each other that the principal disturbance necessarily reacts upon the whole system.

In the division of labor unconsciously cooperating to the product of any given commodity, material interference operates very much like throwing a foreign substances into a mass of delicate machinery. It may not be so abrupt or so serious, but the interference is there, and the irregularity of action will continue until removed or minimized.

It is sometimes helpful and instructive to go back to first principles, especially in the consideration of bills designed to affect fundamental economic laws. In his great work upon the Wealth of Nations, old Adam Smith directed the attention of the people of Great Britain in his introduction to the existence and importance of what he called the division of labor. I want to read an extract from that celebrated, although now almost obsolete work, upon the subject. I read from page 3:

> The greatest improvement in the productive powers of labor and the greater skill, dexterity, and judgment with which it is anywhere directed or applied seem to have been the effects of the division of labor.
> The effects of the division of labor in the general business of society will be more easily understood by considering in what manner it operates in some particular manufactures. It is commonly supposed to be carried furthest in some very trifling ones; not perhaps that it really is carried further in them than in others of more importance, but in those trifling manufactures which are destined to supply the small wants of but a small number of people the whole number of workmen must necessarily be small, and those employed in every different branch of the work can often be collected into the same workshop and placed at once under the view of the spectator. In those great manufactures, on the contrary, which are destined to supply the great wants of the great body of the people, every different branch of the work employs so great a number of workmen that it is impossible to collect them all into the same workshop. We can seldom see more at one time than those employed in one single branch. Though in such manufactures the work may be divided into a greater number of parts than in those of a more trifling nature, the division is not near so obvious, and has accordingly been much less observed.
> To take an example, therefore, from a very trifling manufacture, but one in which the division of labor has been very often taken notice of, the trade of the pin maker, a workman not educated to this business, which the division of labor has rendered a distinct trade, nor acquainted with the use of the machinery employed in it, to the invention of which the same division of labor has probably given occasion, could scarce, perhaps, with his utmost industry, make 1 pin in a day, and certainly could not make 20. But in the way in which this business is now carried on not only the whole work is a peculiar trade, but it is divided into a number of branches, of which the greater part are likewise peculiar trades. One man draws out the wire, another straightens it, a third cuts it, a fourth points it, a fifth grinds it at the top for receiving the head; to make the head requires two or three distinct operations; to put it on is a peculiar business; to whiten the pins is another; it is even a trade by itself to put them into the paper; and the important business of making a pin is, in this manner, divided into about 18 distinct operations, which in some manufactories are all performed by distinct hands, though in others the same man will sometimes perform two or three of them. I have seen a small manufactory of this kind where 10 men only were employed, and where some of them consequently performed two or three distinct operations.
> To fix the wage or designate the price of any branch of the industry contributing to the production of the finished article is to disarrange all of them, to the injury of the enterprise.

This author discusses the subject of the division of labor very extensively, and it is interesting to refer without reading to that part of the discussion which is designed to show the contribution from a great number of sources of labor to the production of the simplest article. Take, for example, the pin which Mr. Smith uses as an illustration. The metal of which the pin is constructed is smelted from the ore, which in turn is dug from the earth by the miner. To dig the ore and to smelt it require the use of tools manufactured expressly for the purpose, made of materials upon which labor has in turn been expended both to produce and to shapen. The workmen engaged in these various contributions to the given result wear clothing which in turn is produced both as to the raw material and as to the finished product by another army of workmen, and these are supported in turn by food raised by another body of laborers, who in turn perform their work with implements produced in succession by other agencies, thus showing a complex yet well-regulated system of cooperation existing throughout society in the production both of the necessities and the comforts of life, which if interfered with by arbitrary acts of legislation necessarily interrupt what Mr. Henry George calls the unconscious cooperation of society and produce disturbances like those which we, as other nations of the past, are seeking to remedy by additional legislation of the same character.

If the Food Commission, in fixing an arbitrary price for wheat, places it too low, our conclusion is that Congress, because of the mistake, should legislate a price higher than that established by the commission or by the President.

It may be, Mr. President, that this will result as the author of the amendment believes. I think the only result will be to aggravate the situation. Corn, barley, and rye will enjoy a further rise. Perhaps this will support the establishment of a still further advance in the price of wheat by the President, which, proving unsatisfactory also, may require additional legislation by us.

We should remember, Mr. President, that legislation of this kind never has been successful at any time in any age among any people. All rules admit of exceptions; there may be some to this one, but I do not think so. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] some time ago directed the attention of the Senate to the disclosures in Alison's History of Europe upon this subject. Mr. Carlyle, in his History of the French Revolution, emphasizes the impotence of legislation designed not only to fix the value of money, but as well to establish arbitrary prices for food and clothing. It can not be done, for it affects a subject outside the possibilities of human legislation. The bolsheviki of Russia have a more direct method of procedure. Political economy and legislation are alike subjects of indifference to them. What they want they take, and after the supply has been exhausted, in all probability they will, like the wolves—at least I hope they will—fall upon and tear each other to pieces. We are only proceeding, Mr. President, in a less direct and less brutal way, in my judgment, when we give no heed to the lessons of experience, which demonstrate that price fixing in its consequences is about as successful as would be an attempt to repeal the law of gravitation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I sympathize with the views which the Senator from Colorado has just expressed upon economic questions; and at the time the so-called fuel bill was under consideration I then expressed the view that it would prove abortive and would fail to satisfy the American people or accomplish the results claimed for the measure. I now want to suggest to the Senator from Colorado, who has just referred to the great law of economics promulgated with such clearness by the greatest of all writers upon political economy, Adam Smith, and to call the Senator's attention to the fact that Prof. Hadley and others contend, in view of the great concentration of wealth in the hands of a few individuals, and particularly in view of our transportation system, in which especially in the past there was a sort of coordination between those who were engaged in large manufacturing enterprises and those who were controlling transportation, that the law of supply and demand, as announced by Adam Smith, was abrogated, and that it is now impossible, in view of industrial conditions prevailing in the United States, for that law to have free play. Does the Senator from Colorado think that there is anything in our political system or anything in our industrial system that would require governmental fixing of prices and which would abrogate or modify the laws and principles of economics given to the world by Adam Smith?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I believe the comments of these later philosophers on the subject of political economy are largely true. Before the Senator from Utah entered the Chamber I adverted to the fact that there were interferences with the operation of this law which were proper subjects of legislation; for example, stock exchanges, where speculation has free play; the cornering the necessities of life, thereby producing a congestion in some places and scarcity in others, which is possible only through the great systems of transportation; also through the creation of large combinations of capital and industry, which control the output of product and restrict the output to the demand, thus enabling them to fix permanent arbitrary prices. Yes; I believe that the economists, to whom the Senator from Utah has referred, have correctly stated the modern situation, but the remedy therefor is not price fixing. It is by the abolition or the governmental control of these artificial conditions which have so grossly interfered with the general operation of the law of supply and demand. We should, so far as legislation can do it—and I think that if enforced it can be made effective—interfere with those artificial conditions which have sprung from inventions, discoveries, transportation, and so forth, and which, of course, depend for their existence upon the law. Those are proper and necessary subjects of legislation. Congress has recognized that and has frequently legislated along those lines, too far, perhaps, in some directions; not far enough in others.

That, however, is entirely outside of the pending situation, which must rest, in my judgment, for its operation upon the law of supply and demand. The Government for the present controls the transportation system and will divorce it from the monopolies. Hence the disturbance necessarily created in the general economy of things to which I have referred and the certain rise of every article recommended and resorted to as a substitute for wheat consequent upon the increased demand therefor and the inability of the producer of wheat to adjust himself to a rise of prices in everything that enters into its production makes this proposal a foredoomed failure; it makes no difference whether you fix the price of wheat at $2, $2.50, or $3 a bushel, the result will be the same.

Of course, Congress might put a price so far in excess of the possibilities of speculation as to make the act a workable one. But that would remedy nothing.

Mr. President, I referred to Adam Smith a few moments ago regarding the general division of labor and the entry of so many essentials into the production of the simplest article. Let me refer now for a moment to Henry George. At the time of his death Mr. George was engaged in a work upon political economy, which he had nearly completed. It is one of the most interesting, if not the most interesting, books that he ever wrote. It is a departure in many respects from the established theories and systems of political economy, and is based not upon the old idea of the greatest good to the greatest number, but upon the law of least resistance. In his chapters upon cooperation, both conscious and unconscious, he has disclosed why artificial interferences with the general laws of production miscarry, but also why socialism can never be anything more than a theory. With the permission of the Senate, I will in this connection read two or three extracts from Chapter X of Mr. George's work upon the subject of Cooperation and Its Two Kinds. I read from page 383:

There is one kind of cooperation, proceeding as it were from without, which results from the conscious direction of a controlling will to a definite end. This we may call directed or conscious cooperation.

And, I presume, Mr. President, that legislation such as is here proposed would fall under that designation.

There is another kind of cooperation, proceeding as it were from within, which results from a correlation in the actions of independent wills, each seeking but its own immediate purpose, and careless, if not indeed ignorant, of the general result. This we may call spontaneous or unconscious cooperation.

The movement of a great army is a good type of cooperation of one kind. Here the actions of many individuals are subordinated to and directed by one conscious will, they becoming, as it were, its body and executing its thought. The providing of a great city with all the manifold things which are constantly needed by its inhabitants is a good type of cooperation of the other kind. This kind of cooperation is far wider, far finer, far more strongly and delicately organized than the kind of cooperation involved in the movements of an army, yet it is brought about not by subordination to the direction of one conscious will, which knows the general result at which it aims, but by the correlation of actions originating in many independent wills, each aiming at its own small purpose without care for or thought of the general result.

The one kind of cooperation seems to have its analogue in those related movements of our body which we are able consciously to direct. The other kind of cooperation seems to have its analogue in the correlation of the innumerable movements, of which we are unconscious, that maintain the bodily frame motions, which in their complexity, delicacy, and precision far transcend our powers of conscious direction, yet by whose perfect adjustment to each other and to the purpose of the whole that cooperation of part and function that makes up the human body and keeps it in life and vigor is brought about and supported.

A beautiful instance of cooperation of the first kind is furnished by the tacking of a square-rigged ship under full sail. The noble vessel, bending gracefully to the breeze under her cloud of canvas, comes driving along, cleaving white furrows at her bow and leaving a yeasty wake at her stern. Suddenly her jibs fly free and her spanker flattens as she curves toward the wind, her foreyards round in, and their sails begin to shake, and at length, as what were their weather braces are hauled taut, to fill on the other side. The after sails that at first held the wind as before begin in their turn to spill, then their yards are shifted, and they, too, take the wind on a different side; and with every sheet and tack in its new place the vessel gathering again her deadened headway begins to drive the foam from her bow as she bends on the other side to cut her way in a new direction. So harmonious are her movements, so seemingly instinct with life, that the savage who sees for the first time such a vessel beating along the coast might take her for a great bird, changing its direction with the movements of its wings as do sea gull and albatross.

And between ship and bird there are certain resemblances. Both are structures in which various parts are combined into a related whole and distinct motions are correlated in harmonious action, and in both movement is produced by the varying angles at which flat surfaces are by a mechanism of joints and ligaments exposed to the impact of air. In a bird, however, the parts in their motions obey instinctively and unconsciously the promptings of the conscious will, but in the ship the motions of the parts are produced by the distinct action of a number of conscious wills, ranging from one or two dozen in a merchant vessel to several hundred in an old-fashioned ship of war. Their cooperation is produced not instinctively and unconsciously but by intelligent obedience to the intelligent orders of one directing will, which prescribes to every man his place and function, directing when, how, and by whom each motion shall be made. The bird veers because, when it wills to veer, every nerve and tendon directly respond with the necessary motions. The ship tacks because the separate wills that manage her rudder and sails consciously obey the successive commands which prescribe each of the necessary motions from a first order, "Full for stays," to the last, "Belay all." A series of intelligent directions consciously obeyed by those to whom they are addressed bring about and correlate the movements of the parts.

Nor could the maneuvers of a ship be carried on without such intelligent direction. Any attempt to substitute independent action, no matter how willing, for responsive obedience to intelligent direction would be certain ere long to result as in the traditional coasting schooner manned by two—captain and mate—where the captain, who was steering, irritated by some gratuitous advice of the mate, who was tending jibsheets, yelled out to him, "You run your end of this schooner and I'll run mine," whereupon there was a rattle of chain at the bow and the mate yelled back, "Captain, I've anchored my end of this schooner; you can run your end where you choose."

Mr. President, that is not a bad illustration of price fixing by legislation. We can anchor certain articles and let certain other articles whose production is dependent upon them run where they choose.

Now, much of the cooperation of man in producing social effects is of the nature of that by which a ship is sailed. In involves the delegation to individuals of the power of arranging and directing what others shall do, thus securing for the general action the advantages of one managing and correlating intelligence; but while cooperation of this kind is indispensable to producing certain results by conjoined action, it is helpless or all but helpless to bring about certain other results involving a longer series and more complicated and delicate actions and adjustments.

I think I have read enough from this very interesting and profound work to illustrate my contention. Suffice it to say that its every line and page upon this subject of conscious and unconscious cooperation in society is of the most intense interest. The unconscious cooperation of all men to a given end in the industrial world or to a number of given ends necessarily means that where conscious cooperation attempts to interfere it must recognize its entity. It can not deal separately with this, that, and the other part of it, since it is absolutely certain that the consequent disturbance in nine cases out of ten will defeat the object of the interference. Take, for example, Mr. President, the fixing of the price of wheat at $2 or $2.25 or $2.30 a bushel—it makes no difference what the price is. With every other article of commerce having free play, with every other product of the farm subject to no interference, with the shifting of demand from the thing to which the law relates, to the things which are free from the law and the consequent necessary increase of price because of that shifting demand, not only of the product but of the labor and of the machinery necessary to produce it, the result inevitably, in my judgment, is to defeat the purpose and the object of the law.

Mr. President, I can not leave this book without reading one other extract from the same chapter. Of course, I have not assumed to call the attention of the Senate to the chapter as an entirety, which perhaps I should have done, but because of these things, these fundamental things, Mr. George says:

This is the fatal defect of all forms of socialism—the reason of the fact, which all observation shows, that any attempt to carry conscious regulation and direction beyond the narrow sphere of social life in which it is necessary inevitably works injury, hindering even what it is intended to help.

And the rational of this great fact may, I think, at least in some measure, be perceived when we consider that the originating element in all production is thought or intelligence—the spiritual, not the material. This spiritual element, this intelligence or thought power as it appears in man can not be combined or fused as can material force.

No greater words of wisdom were ever penned by man.

Mr. President, this bill is an interference, and a very important interference, with a general condition dependent upon practically all of the forces that enter into production in civilized countries. The farmer complains that while he is unable to sell his wheat for more than $2, he has to pay the farm hand 100 per cent more than when the order went into effect; that he has to pay from 100 to 200 per cent more for his harrow, his plow, his reaper, his thrasher, and all the other machinery which is required for successful farming in modern times, and, that being the case, he naturally thinks that the remedy ought to come from the same source from which the disease proceeded; that is to say, from legislative action.

If I had my way, Mr. President, I would put no price upon wheat; or, if I did, I would, as has been suggested, penalize by legislative limitation or by Executive limitation every other article of human commerce, for there is scarcely one which does not enter into the production of a bushel of wheat, or a bushel of corn, or a suit of clothes, or a book, or any simple article of our ordinary life, many of which are subject to artificial prices because of the combinations to which I have referred, not through legislation, but by the arbitrary edict of those controlling production.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator a question. I understand, I think, what the Senator would do if he had the power, and that is to repeal the provision which fixes the price and subject all commodities to the operations of the law of supply and demand; but the law under which the price has been fixed is upon the statute books. I am not conceding that that law has been properly construed to give the authority to fix any such price, but the price has been fixed. Now we have got to remedy, if we can possibly remedy, the injury that has been brought about by stretching the law which authorized a license to such an extent that the Food Commissioner can say to the licensee, "You shall not continue in your vocation or business unless you pay a limited price for the products upon which you operate." I do not think we had any authority to do that, but we have done it; and now, having done it, how are we going to get out of the situation in which we are placed? Undoubtedly we can not repeal the law. If we could, I would vote with the Senator that the Government should not fix the price of those things; but, inasmuch as the Government has fixed the price; that is, it has said to those dealers, "You shall not pay more than a certain price," and thereby has driven the price down to $2.20 a bushel, when otherwise under the law of supply and demand it would probably be $3 a bushel to-day; how would the Senator reach that proposition and undo the injustice?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course that presents a very difficult problem, one to which, I presume, no man could give an absolutely satisfactory answer. I do not think we can improve the situation by legislating along the same lines, and I have endeavored to give my reasons for so thinking. We may produce a temporary benefit and make the farmer feel like some men do after taking a good, stiff stimulant; but when the effect of it is gone he will feel, as some of them do, that perhaps he would have been better off without it. I would say—and I have given a little thought to the subject—that, instead of this, we amend the food law so as to require the food commissioner or the President, whenever he thinks he should fix the price of one grain, to fix the price of all grains, and whenever he fixes the price of all grains, to fix the price of labor and the price to the farmer for the machinery necessary for the production of the crop. That may be impossible also, but I believe it is quite as possible and more feasible than a law like this. I may be mistaken. I know the situation is one which appeals to us all, and I concede that it justifies the idea expressed here by many who under the circumstances now existing think they should vote for this amendment; but it does not appeal to me, because I do not believe that it would more than temporarily postpone the suffering which is now complained of by a very large body of our people.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator realize that the pending amendment does not attempt to fix a maximum price, but proposes to fix only the minimum?

Mr. THOMAS. I realize that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And by reason of that will it not leave the law in the same position that it is at the present time?

Mr. THOMAS. I recognize that, Mr. President, but I am as much opposed to fixing a minimum price as I am to fixing a maximum price. The objections to such legislation are not met by establishing a minimum instead of a maximum standard.

It may be that under this provision, which substitutes a minimum for a maximum price, the President will be quite as unwilling to exercise his authority by raising the price from the minimum as he has been to raise the price from that originally fixed. With those who are to execute the law I do not think the fact that this is a minimum instead of a maximum will prove, in practice, of any great importance. I hope I am mistaken—that is, if the motion shall prevail, and the amendment be adopted—but that is my impression.

I will join at any time in the effort to repeal any provision of the statute upon which the authority to fix a maximum price for any of these grains is pivoted. The Senator from North Dakota says that it is impossible to repeal the law. That may be. It might be possible that if Congress should pass such a law it would be only to challenge the veto of the President.

But, Mr. President, there is one peculiar feature of this proposed law to which I will refer before taking my seat. It is found in the last clause or paragraph of the amendment. I will read it:

This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any wheat produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on wheat and to the value of wheat at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon wheat when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon wheat under any then existing tariff law of the United States.

Mr. President, I am at a loss to account for this provision. Perhaps my natural suspicion of anything which spells "tariff" has caused me to look askance at it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I had the same view of the proposition that he had; but that language is imported from the law passed in August last. It is, word for word, a copy of the existing law.

Mr. THOMAS. That is another reason why I am glad I did not vote for the existing law.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; I think it is an added reason for congratulation.

Mr. THOMAS. Unfortunately I was too ill to be here to add my vote to the votes of my associates for this and the revenue law, and I derive infinite comfort from the fact.

But, Mr. President, the idea that at the present time or at any time in the immediate future there will be importations of wheat into the United States is one which seems to me, with all due respect to the author of this measure, to be too grotesque for serious consideration. If there is one product for which there is a greater demand than ever before known in history, it is grain of all kinds; and if there ever was a time when the difficulties of ocean transportation were paramount, that time is now. If Argentina's every acre were devoted to the cultivation of wheat, if the vast stretches of Siberia could be sown to this grain and the crop could be harvested, it would be physically impossible to transport a bushel of it to the United States until the shipping situation is vastly relieved.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am fearful that the Senator, reading only a portion of that law, did not fully contemplate the purpose of the particular section which he read.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be.

Mr. McCUMBER. The law, as the Senator will remember, did not provide for a minimum price to be paid by the Government, but it was a statement on behalf of Congress to the farmers of the United States, and, reduced to the shape of a dialogue, it would run like this:

"This country needs wheat in 1918. It will, in all probability, need all that can be raised. We want you, the farmer, to plant it."

The farmer responded:

"I should be willing to plant it if I felt certain that the war would continue and keep up prices; but if I should increase my acreage to a great extent, and then we should have peace, the price would go down immediately to such an extent that I could not pay my expenses."

Congress then said to the farmer:

"Go ahead, and we will guarantee that your price shall be at least $2 a bushel; and if there is peace in the land, and you otherwise could not get $2 a bushel, the Government will take it off your hands."

The law itself provided that the Government should buy it at $2 a bushel. That did not contemplate time of war. In time of war it was certain that the price would be $2 or more; but in time of peace the Government agreed to guarantee the farmer, and take it off his hands. Then, so that the Government should not lose in peace conditions and under peace relations, the Government, to protect itself, speaking through Congress, provided that a tariff might be levied sufficient to prevent, in fact, any importations whatever. Now, of course, in time of peace, and with wheat worth, by a world demand, may be not to exceed $1.25 or $1.50 a bushel, and the Government taking it at $2 a bushel, it would have to protect itself from perhaps three or four hundred million bushels that could be raised right across the line in Canada.

That was the purpose of that provision in the law of 1917.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator for making that statement. It is a very clear one, but to me it is not a convincing one. In the first place, were peace to come to-morrow it would be a long time before the present prices would be interfered with and a very long time before Canada would be able to produce much more than wheat enough for herself and to satisfy such natural demands as could be made upon her.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to correct him there?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Canada, in the provinces west of the Red River, can raise 250,000,000 bushels, and she can not consume more than one-fifth of it, and she does not need a ship. We have railways that reach into all of her fields, and therefore, without a single ship, she could throw it over in three months.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, Canada can not raise wheat, any more than America can, without labor. Canada's labor market, like ours, is extremely restricted; and I repeat that in my judgment—I am not infallible—Canada will have plenty to do, as will we and other nations engaged in this war, for a long time after it shall have ended, in supplying our necessities at prevailing prices.

One of the most interesting contributions to the literature of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, if I may so term it, was that of Congressman James A. Garfield in 1866 or 1867, immediately after the war, when he demonstrated, both by logic and by historical precedent, that prices and expenses prevailing at the end of a war will persist for two or three years thereafter; I do not remember the exact period of time, but a considerable time, and much more than a year after the close of hostilities. He made it in explanation of the fact that although the Civil War had terminated some time before, governmental expenses had increased. They reached their maximum, if I remember correctly, in 1867. So that I am still unable to perceive why we should enact this provision, there being, in my judgment, no occasion for it.

Mr. President, let me say, in conclusion, that I do not believe in suspending the Senate rules for the purpose of introducing riders upon appropriation bills except under the most extraordinary circumstances. The habit—for it is a habit—of adding riders of all sorts relating to subjects entirely foreign to the title of the bill and the subject thereof has become a general rule rather than the exception in our methods of legislation. I do not believe that this is an exigency which requires or demands the suspension of our rules, and I shall therefore vote against the motion to suspend.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I desire to make of record a correction of a statement which has done a very grievous wrong and injustice to a high-minded and a patriotic citizen.

In the record of the Senate proceedings, published under date of March 12, in the speech of the Senator from Missouri, appears a copy of a telegram signed by Mr. Kellogg, of California, making a most serious charge against Mr. C. H. Bentley, of the Food Administration. The telegram indicates that he had endeavored to use his relation with the Food Administration to the detriment of tomato growers in California and to the advantage of the company with which he is connected. He is actually named as the author of an order fixing prices to tomato growers.

These statements are wholly erroneous and without foundation and do a grievous injustice to one who came to Washington last June at the urgent request of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. The facts are that Mr. Bentley came here at material personal sacrifice and to the disadvantage of his business, which had only recently been organized. As the canning season was then approaching, his associates assented only in the thought of rendering a service of importance to the Government. They had no desire to sell their wares to the Government, for their estimated output for the season had been sold to the wholesale trade. This custom arises from the necessity for planting or contracting to plant products like corn, peas, and tomatoes for canning purposes long in advance of the canning season.

In the conference held with the Quartermaster General of the Army and with the Paymaster General of the Navy, under the auspices of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, it developed that inquiries for the tremendous quantities of foods to be required had not brought satisfactory proposals either in quantity or in price. A committee appointed by the canners urged that the requirements be prorated throughout the industry, each canner taking his percentage in proportion to his pack, the prices to be fixed by the Government. For the protection of the Government it was desirable that some disinterested agency should determine the costs of these various supplies, and as the President had expressly directed the Federal Trade Commission to perform such functions, an arrangement was made for the Federal Trade Commission to delegate a cost accounting specialist to make these investigations and to advise with the Quartermaster General of the Army and with the Paymaster General of the Navy in matters of price determination. The authority for price fixing on products for the Army and for the Navy has clearly remained throughout and has been exercised by these officials.

Mr. Bentley acted as chairman of this canned foods committee and assisted in the development and execution of the plan. He then prepared to return to California, but was urged by Mr. Hoover to remain and assist in the organization of the Food Administration. He did this and was made head of the Division of Canned Foods, Beans, and Dried Fruits. His activities were to advise with the Enforcement Division in the interpretation and administration of the law with respect to the manufacturers and wholesale dealers in these products. By joint action of the Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, and the Food Administration a committee on the conservation of tin plate was appointed, and Mr. Bentley has acted as chairman of this committee. The endeavor has been to secure an adequate supply of all materials relating to the industry not only for commercial but for home canning. After the passage of the food-control act the functions of advising the Army and the Navy in the matter of foods was turned over to the Food Administration, and the War Food Purchase Board, consisting of Admiral Samuel McGowan, Paymaster General of the Navy, chairman; Col. W. R. Grove, Quartermaster General's office, of the Army; Frank S. Scott, cost-accounting specialist, Federal Trade Commission; and Mr. W. V. S. Thorne, of the Food Administration, was formed to advise with the Army and the Navy in the matter of price fixing. After the resignation of Mr. Thorne, Mr. F. S. Snyder became the representative of the Food Administration.

To assist the War Food Purchase Board in securing necessary information as to available supplies and to secure such supplies without unnecessary disturbance of the trade, which would tend to enhance the cost of foods to the consumer, the Division of Allocation of Purchase was formed in the Food Administration, but Mr. Bentley is not and never has been a member of this division nor of the War Food Purchase Board. He has never attended its meetings excepting on specific request, and, as a matter of fact, was in California when the action now in controversy was taken. He was not consulted in these matters and had no part in fixing these disputed prices, as is evidenced by the letter of Admiral McGowan, which I now read:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., March 15, 1918.

Mr. C. H. BENTLEY,
United States Food Administration, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BENTLEY: I have just received your letter of even date inclosing copy of the following telegram sent last night by Mr. Edgar Rickard to the Food Administration at San Francisco:

"War Food Purchasing Board, consisting of Admiral McGowan, Paymaster General of the Navy; Col. Grove, Quartermaster General's office, of Army; Scott, representing Federal Trade Commission; and Snyder, representing Food Administration, officially went on record positively stating that Bentley was not consulted and had no participation in action of board inviting tender for canned tomatoes, nor did he have any participation in decision of the Army and Navy in fixing limits on price on raw tomatoes. Further information will be given to the press to-morrow. Bentley is not and never has been a member of the War Food Purchasing Board."

As you well know, that telegram was shown to me before it was sent, and my only statement was that it stated the case very mildly, because when the matter of certain criticisms of you in connection with the subject of the telegram was brought up yesterday forenoon at the meeting of the Food Purchase Board, of which I am the chairman, everybody, including the Navy, the Army, the Food Administration, and the Federal Trade Commission, was amazed to learn that you had been criticized for something that we had done and with which you had no connection whatever.

I wish very much that you might have been present there to hear the unanimous and enthusiastic opinion expressed about you by everybody, the one idea of us all being that we should very much desire to have more men just like C. H. Bentley if we could possibly get them.

For the rest, I want to add that your visits to and consultations with the Food Purchase Board have been all too few and invariably on our initiative, not yours.

I am aware that the facts in any case usually have great difficulty in overtaking and correcting erroneous advance statements, for the reason that, human nature being constituted as it is, it is really a readable news item when a statement is made to the effect that a good man and a big man is, after all, not so good or so big as he seems to be, whereas the mere correction of such an error is not accompanied by any thrills or deserving of attractive headlines. And yet, after all, this is by no means a reflection upon the press of the country nor yet even on its readers. It is rather a tribute to the consistency with which manly men habitually deport themselves, because if they all in fact fall from grace from time to time the value of the news item would be wholly lost.

With all good wishes and with unbounded respect and regard, I am,

Yours, faithfully,

(Signed) S. McGOWAN,
Paymaster General of the Navy.

I want to say in addition to that, Mr. President, that those of us in California who know Mr. C. H. Bentley—and there are very, very many of us who do—could not for one instant believe, nor could we for one instant entertain either charge or suspicion, against his integrity or against his patriotism. Mr. Bentley has for more than a generation occupied a prominent place in the affairs of our State and in those of our city. He has ever been a man aggressive, a man earnest, a man able, a man patriotic, a man unselfish, and there has never, in all of the generation in which he has played a prominent part in San Francisco and in California, attached to him the slightest suspicion. His reputation and his standing have been above reproach; his character, of the very highest, has never been assailed. Because his reputation has been so unsullied and his character so high, because his private and his public life have made him preeminent with us, and because we know him so well, we feel that this correction is due him, and, with him, we regret the unfounded charge that was made against him.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, will he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Who made the charge?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It was made in a telegram from California that was read by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, does the Senator intend to address himself to the pending motion?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; just for a moment.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield to me to make one or two references to the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator yields the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would rather not yield the floor. If the Senator will permit me to go ahead now, I shall be glad to yield to him for a question.

Mr. GORE. It was not a question. I wanted to make one or two comments on the remarks of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator from California wish to ask a question?

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to ask the Senator if he is addressing himself to the subject introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I intend to make a few remarks upon the pending motion.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire permission of the Senator to reinforce as strongly as I can, from intimate personal knowledge, the remarks of my colleague as to the high personal character and unimpeachable integrity of Charles H. Bentley, of California. I have here telegrams from his business competitors confirming this opinion. May I ask the permission of the Senator to continue——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator yields the floor if he does.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would rather not yield the floor at this time, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no desire to take the floor from the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss this measure, and shall occupy the time of the Senate but for a few moments. The surpassing importance of this question to the State which I represent, as well as to the Nation, impels me to state my reasons for affirmatively voting thereon.

I believe it is unnecessary for me to say that, as a general proposition, I do not believe in the efficacy of price fixing by law. I believe rather that the natural economic law of supply and demand should prevail; and I am inclined to the opinion that it would have been better in the case of wheat that the law of supply and demand should operate without legislative restriction. But the question at present is not whether we shall institute a system of price fixing with regard to wheat, since it has already been accomplished and tested, the 1917 crop being produced and marketed under a price fixed pursuant to law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator if it is not a fact, however, that when the embargo was placed by the Government upon exportations, and those exportations included wheat, it was loudly insisted by farmers and representatives of the farmers that having cut off their export market the duty rested upon the Government to fix the price of wheat so that they would get such a price as was fair, and that the establishment of a price for wheat was by reason of the embargo, and because of the demands made by the agricultural interests of our country?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will answer the question of the Senator from Utah in this way:

There was no demand by the farmers, after the power of embargo was given the President, to fix the price of wheat. I received no request from the producers in my State or any other State to vote for fixing the price of wheat. I did receive requests, that if Congress contemplated such action, to vote for a price of $2.50 a bushel, or at least a greater price than that reported in the first instance.

It is true, undoubtedly, that argument was presented in the Senate and in the committee that the President, having the power of embargo, controlled and could close the world's wheat market in this country. I voted for that embargo because I believed it was a necessary war power, as I voted in all other matters and shall in the future vote for every power which I believe to be necessary or which may be necessary to carry on this war. It was stated that it was necessary for many reasons, which I shall not review now; but with the power invested in the President to embargo wheat, and in view of the shortage in the world's wheat supply, and the intention—and I think it was necessary—to purchase wheat for distribution to allied nations and neutral countries needing it, of course, the President could control the price; and it was argued, therefore, that Congress should fix a minimum price. My own judgment is that the situation could have been met without Congress fixing a price. I voted to increase the price as a minimum to $2 a bushel, and because, as the Senators will remember, when it was first reported from the committee it was $1.50 a bushel—an absolutely inadequate price.

It is true that if the foreign market had been destroyed the price of wheat probably would have declined, because the surplus of our grain always has found its market in Europe, which to a great extent has made the price. On the other hand, it is true that if the natural laws of trade had been permitted to operate—if the markets had been free and open, and foreign countries had, as they had in the past, purchased their wheat in our open market—wheat would have been more than $2.50 a bushel. In fact, when the law was enacted, and when the price was fixed, wheat was selling in this country for from $2.50 to $3 per bushel.

I am not criticizing the administration for wheat purchasing. I think, on the whole, it has been honestly and efficiently handled. But if there was reason last spring for fixing the price at $2.20 a bushel, there is all the more reason now for fixing the price at $2.50 a bushel, because the world's supply is shorter; the things the farmer must purchase are higher; labor is wanting now to a greater extent than ever before and is higher in price; and the difference in cost to the farmer between the spring of 1917 and the spring of 1918 is more than 30 cents a bushel, the increase which this amendment proposes to establish.

It is unnecessary for me to again relate the circumstances which actuated the Congress to enact the previous price-fixing law in respect of wheat, for which I voted and for which I make no apology. I believed generally at that time that the law was necessary, and I do not know what might have happened had it not been enacted. But, in view of the situation which exists in respect of the price for all other agricultural and manufactured products which are necessary to the prosecution of the war, and in view of the prices which the farmer is compelled to pay for the products he purchases, we can not justify a vote against this legislation.

Permit me to briefly discuss the principle which was established by the law of August 10, 1917. In section 14 it is provided as follows:

> Whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. * * *

We also provided that for the year 1918 the price should not be less than $2 per bushel. At that very time the price of wheat was more than $2 per bushel. It was selling in Oklahoma, in Kansas, in Texas, in Minnesota at the stations, as I recollect—the chairman will correct me if I am wrong—at about $2.50 per bushel or a little more.

The production of wheat can not be encouraged by decreasing the price. I know of no way in which the growing of wheat, which is so necessary to carry on this war and to support the allied nations, can be induced by decreasing the price. It is true that all prices during this war have abnormally increased. It is true in every war. I remember very well after the close of the War of the Rebellion, in 1865, wheat was worth $2.50 a bushel in Minnesota, notwithstanding the limited facilities for transportation and the high cost thereof. In the spring of 1917, after nearly three years of the European war, wheat was worth from $2.50 to $3 per bushel, and if it had not been for the price fixed, I believe it would be worth much more than that to-day.

It has been stated that it is necessary that this country should produce the wheat to carry on this war. I know there is a shortage in France; and in England, of course, the production is small. Wheat can not be brought from Australia, nor are the wheat fields of Russia open to the allied nations. I know that this country and Canada must produce wheat at whatever cost if we are to have food to carry on the war.

I hesitate to vote to raise the price of food, but it seems to me we are confronted with a condition which makes an increased price absolutely necessary, if we are going to produce wheat in this country. Manifestly, farmers will not raise wheat unless the profits therefrom are equivalent to the profits derived from other products, any more than manufacturers and producers of commercial articles in the country will produce them when they can make more money producing something else.

I do not make any argument as to the cost of raising wheat, because the Senate is aware that with labor at exorbitant prices, with machinery at high cost, and considering everything which the farmer must buy at maximum prices, there is not much money in raising wheat, in view of the fact that the average production in the spring-wheat country is only about 14 or 15 bushels to the acre. This country is confronted with some grave agricultural problems. At the close of the War of the Rebellion, 75 per cent of the people lived upon and secured their living from the land. To-day less than 35 per cent of the people are engaged in agricultural pursuits. The comparative number has greatly decreased from year to year.

From an agricultural standpoint, our country is one of great fertility, with an advantageous climate, the most improved and modern machinery and methods, and highly developed farming communities, enjoying the best educational advantages along agricultural lines, and yet the agricultural districts, in comparison with the cities with their industries, have declined from year to year. As I have heretofore stated, less than 35 per cent of the people to-day obtain their living from the farm. It is an appalling condition which should be remedied by intelligent study on the part of Government scientists. Had it not been for this war which suddenly developed a universal shortage of food, we might have continued filling the cities and great industrial centers with the best blood and sinew of the country, which is usually withdrawn from the farm.

It has been very forcibly brought to our attention that a decrease of production at this time threatens disaster to this country and to our allies in the world's greatest struggle. I repeat that there should be an intelligent study of the development of systems of cultivation, markets, fertilizeration, machinery, labor, and all that goes to make agriculture a success. These subjects should receive the most careful attention by American scientific men and by Members of Congress, because if this decrease continues not only will we and the world be threatened with food shortage but it will undermine the very foundations of this country.

There is no doubt that an independent proprietary ownership and cultivation of the soil constitutes the strength of the Nation. It made France. The distribution of the lands to the people which emanated from the fiery furnace of the French Revolution, the ownership and cultivation by the small farmer, enabled her to stand the strain of the Napoleonic wars, the wars of the middle century, the Franco-Prussian War, and this, the greatest conflict of all times. The very foundation of the greatness of the country is its proprietary farmer. Nothing is of greater importance to us than the study of the economic principles which lie at the foundation of agriculture and to discover the reasons why the people have been flocking to the cities to employments and occupations that tend to degenerate rather than to increase the strength of the Nation.

We must solve this problem. I do not anticipate in the midst of this war that a solution can be reached, but we can adopt this plan: As long as we have embarked upon this trial of price fixing we can fix the price for the 1918 wheat crop commensurate with the price of other products which will, I believe, increase largely the acreage and the production of wheat in this country, and when the war is over, or perhaps before, we can take up the greater problem—the problem of encouraging agriculture, individual ownership, and of turning the people from the cities and great centers of industry back to the farm, so that the strength of this great Nation shall be in the future, as it has been in the past, based upon the soil.

Mr. President, of course some of the reasons why the people have inclined to the cities are that the cities have furnished greater opportunities for profit in commercial, industrial, and professional pursuits, and offer a more attractive environment, which the younger generation have been unable to resist. I shall not enter into a discussion of these economic questions, but undoubtedly they have been powerful factors in drawing the young men from the farms. This bill, however, will not settle these questions. If anything is to be accomplished it is a temporary expedient for the greatest possible production of wheat during the war, which is an absolute necessity. The solution of the other problems is as great a necessity, but it will consume a longer time and require scientific investigation and further legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that there has been a great disparity of late years between the population of our rural districts and that of the cities altogether to the advantage of the centers of population. Whatever fanciful theory theorists may entertain in reference to the cause, those who make a study of it in their offices, and so forth, of course it all resolves itself into the proposition that in the combination of circumstances, economic and otherwise, which control American life, other avocations have paid better than that of the farmer. There will always be plenty of farmers in this country so long as we have soil of the nature and kind which we now have if the farming occupation pays proportionately with the other occupations and industries of the country.

Mr. President, I should be perfectly satisfied with $2.20 wheat, and I should not stand in my place to challenge that price or to advocate any other price if the influences and the powers which control the price of wheat would also control the prices of those things which must necessarily enter into the production of wheat. Two-dollar-and-twenty-cent wheat seems to those who are not engaged in wheat raising and who are not familiar with the expenses connected with it a very high price. Compared with the prices before the war, of course it is a high price, and naturally we make that comparison as soon as the subject of $2.20 wheat is mentioned.

I should not desire to advocate here any higher price if the articles which enter into the production of wheat, all those things which the farmer must necessarily buy and utilize, were controlled and the prices fixed proportionately to the prices which have been established for the farmer. But that is not the case, as we all know.

When the food-administration bill was before the body an amendment was offered by myself providing a rule by which the price of other articles—farm implements, cotton, steel, etc.—could be controlled and fixed the same as the price of wheat. In the first place, if I remember correctly, that amendment was adopted in substance, but within 24 hours a change came over the spirit of our dream, and combinations which are made outside of the Senate Chamber, not in it, moved upon the bulwarks and that amendment was reconsidered and voted out. It was manifest that those who were engaged in the other industries did not want to be placed under the price-fixing law or placed in a position wherein the law could be construed into a price-fixing proposition. While we did enact a law which enabled those who were executing it to fix the price of wheat we declined to enact a law which would enable those executing it to fix the price of farm implements and other products which it was necessary for the farmer to have.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that it is possible to fix a price by statute of a staple article and permit other prices to follow the law of supply and demand without courting disaster. It is an impossible program. It will not work out. The two rules and the two laws will not work side by side. If we are going to persist in the fixing of the price of the farm product—of wheat particularly—we must necessarily enter a larger field, which it will be found difficult to occupy when we undertake to enter it and fix the price of those things which the farmer must buy. If we do not do that, then we must keep moving up, by legislative act, the price of wheat in accordance with the price of the articles which the law of supply and demand fixes. That, as I understand, is what we are engaged in doing. We are simply seeking, as the Senator from Minnesota said a few moments ago, to fix a price corresponding with the increase of the prices of these other articles, such as farm implements and labor and those things which enter into the price of the production of wheat. It is for this reason, Mr. President, and no other, that I shall support this motion to submit this amendment and support the amendment in case the motion prevails.

Let me read a single paragraph from the President's address delivered to Congress December 4, 1917:

> Recent experience has convinced me that the Congress must go further in authorizing the Government to set limits to prices. The law of supply and demand, I am sorry to say, has been replaced by the law of unrestrained selfishness. While we have eliminated profiteering in several branches of industry, it still runs impudently rampant in others. The farmers, for example, complain with a great deal of justice that, while the regulation of food prices restricts their incomes, no restraints are placed upon the prices of most of the things they must themselves purchase; and similar inequities obtain on all sides.

There, in my judgment, is the statement of the whole proposition in a single paragraph. While we have fixed the price of this staple which the farmer produces, we have permitted the profiteer to indulge his appetite in other lines, and we have permitted other articles to be controlled entirely by the law of supply and demand. The great wheat producer, without whom this war can not go forward and without whom hunger and distress will curse the land, is singled out, placed under a certain price, while all around him men in other avocations operate under the law of supply and demand. It is unjust, uneconomic, and unwise. It is, as the President says, inequitable.

The result of it is that the farmer is placed in an inequitable position, and not only that, but so inequitable that it is impossible for him to maintain his position in the present situation. As I stated a moment ago—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator believe that the law of supply and demand has been replaced by unrestrained selfishness, and that that is the reason for this situation?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not. I would not apply that to the entire situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Or to any considerable part of the situation?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; to a considerable part.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Unrestrained selfishness is the cause for a good part of the high prices to-day?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think so; that of certain industries.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Anything except what affects agriculture?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; in my judgment, but, of course, a man speaks rather his opinion than from actual gathering of data in regard to those things. However, I think that farm implements come fairly within that rule.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator thinks that unrestrained selfishness has put up the price of farm implements.

Mr. BORAH. There may be some restraint about it. I do not say that it is wholly unrestrained, but it is unrestrained where they think it is safe to go.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator thinks there is nothing that does restrain except caution?

Mr. BORAH. I suppose we ought not to say these men are not patriotic, and I will not say it, but I am of the opinion that the business instinct and the business disposition of these men need legal restraint quite as much as that of the farmer. I would feel safer if they were both treated alike.

Mr. President, if the Senator pushes the question I will give him an illustration. The President of the Farmers' Equity of my State went East in the spring of 1917 and arranged for several hundred thousand dollars' worth of farm implements with the wholesalers under a written contract. That written contract was based upon a price fixed by reason of the war, and by reason of war conditions, so that the price already provided for in the contract was far in advance of the price that prevailed the year before, and supposedly sufficient to cover any anticipated rise by reason of war conditions. The president of the society, which is not a political society but purely a business society, being a cooperative organization, returned home, and some time after received a notice of the cancellation of the contract as a contract. He protested against it, but his protest was not heeded. He returned to the East and made another contract involving a large increase, and that, as I now remember, was afterwards canceled, and they made a third contract.

Mr. President, I have not the figures here so that I can give them exact, although I have some quoted here from a farmer in my State which I will read later showing that the price of some of these farm implements went up as high as 300 per cent. That leads me to say, without I hope doing these men an injustice, that they were not regardful of anything except their complete business interest in this proposition. Certainly they got the full advantage of the law of supply and demand while the man who purchased the implements was chained down by law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am informed—I do not know that my information is correct, but it will have a bearing on the incident to which the Senator refers—my information is to the effect that steel, which the manufacturers must have to make the implements, cost them $30 per ton prior to our entrance into the war and some time prior to it, and they are now paying $100 a ton, which is an increase of 300 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Another exhibition of unrestrained selfishness.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On whose part?

Mr. BORAH. On the part of the men who started it in the first place, and including every man who adds an unnecessary price to the article until it gets down to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That comes down to labor, because labor becomes a signal cost in the production of these things.

Mr. BORAH. I am not standing here to defend labor or anyone else. I am stating facts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not attacking labor either.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know to what extent the labor prices entered into the increased cost of the production of steel, but if my figures are correct with reference to the labor price it has increased by no means in proportion to the increased cost of steel. I have had some figures presented to me upon that precise question. Of course, there has been an increase in the price of labor, and justly so, so far as that is concerned within reason, but it has been in no sense in proportion to the increase of price of the articles which labor produces.

The income from these institutions, in the midst of war, is sufficient proof that notwithstanding the increase in the cost of labor their profits are far in excess of what they were before the war began.

Mr. REED. I assume that the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield for a question. I understand that does not take me off the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For a question; no.

Mr. REED. I am going to ask a question. I assume that the Senator will agree that the extraordinary demand for labor has run the demand up higher than the supply, and that naturally has advanced wages; that has been one of the causes. Is not that the Senator's opinion?

Mr. BORAH. I am of the opinion that that is true.

Mr. REED. Now, I want to ask the Senator, in view of the fact that we have passed the daylight-saving law, and according to all the authorities have saved one hour a day, whether he does not think wages ought to come down?

Mr. BORAH. I do not disagree with the Senator, whatever he says.

Mr. REED. I have been reading the papers, and I find it is stated that we have saved 13 per cent of time, and that there will be enough food raised in an hour—in this extra hour—to supply 1,000,000 men in our Army in France; and I am just wondering why we did not run the clock forward two hours and save enough time to make up the food shortage.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to a question whenever I can do so without losing the floor. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. The question I desire to propound to the Senator from Idaho is this: We have lengthened the beginning of the day by law, to which the Senator from Missouri has referred; and if we allow the clerks time and a half increased pay for the extra time they work during the longer daylight I do not think we have diminished the cost of labor.

Mr. BORAH. In a single paragraph I can state my position upon the eight-hour day contention, so that I shall not have to occupy the floor again.

I am in favor of paying the Government employees what the eight-hour day is worth, and I want them to work eight hours. In this time of war, when labor is scarce and when everyone is obligated to do the utmost that he can, putting forth his efforts and in conserving them in the different ways of life to help the situation, I do not think a man should contend that he should work only seven hours a day. While I am not in favor of the clerks working eight hours a day for the same pay that they receive for seven hours a day, I am in favor of paying them what their labor is worth, and then asking them to do what a man can do consistently with the preservation of his health during the existence of this war.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said about the labor situation with reference to the farm, and that is one of the things which enters into the cost of wheat, and very largely so. The price of labor has gone up at least 100 per cent, and in some places—notably in my part of the country—it has gone up more than that. Not only that, but in a large measure it is not to be had. The Labor Department in Washington contend that there is a sufficient amount of labor in the country, provided it were properly distributed, and, as I take it from that, they further intend to contend that there is a sufficient amount of labor which can work upon the farms effectively if it is properly distributed. I do not know whether or not the Labor Department is correct in that contention; I hope the Labor Department is correct; but I do know that by reason of the draft and by reason of the falling away from the farms of laborers for the last several years labor is at a minimum upon the farm, and that it can not be had; it is not subject to employment whatever price you may be willing to pay, because it is not there. That situation presents one of the most serious features of this entire problem with reference to the production of wheat or the production of any other kind of farm product. As I say, I do not know whether or not the Labor Department is correct; but I do know that, if it is correct, it is exceedingly important that without any delay whatever an effort be made to distribute the labor which is supposed to be subject to distribution in different parts of the country.

Now, upon this question of the price of wheat and of the labor situation, I want to read some letters from those who know the true situation much better than we do here. I read first from a letter of a Mr. Potter, of Grangeville, Idaho. He states the situation with great clearness and force. I read from the letter:

DEAR SENATOR: Beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 19th, for which I thank you.

Late developments in the wheat situation makes it seem necessary to me to take advantage of your kindness and write you further in regard to this matter.

The developments referred to is the proclamation of President Wilson fixing the 1918 wheat price. If this stands and is not overruled by Congress or his own better judgment, it will go down in history as one of the greatest mistakes in this world war.

It seems to be his impression that the present shortage is caused by the farmers holding the wheat on the farm, and it would not do to increase the price on the 1918 crop for fear the farmer would hold his 1917 crop over for that price.

I know nothing about the facts in this case except in my own locality. Here, as soon as we learned last fall that the price was fixed, every bushel that was not required for feed was hauled to the warehouse as quickly as possible. I believe this will be found to be the condition throughout the United States.

The farmers may not be very wise as a class, but I do not think they would be foolish enough to hold their wheat when there was no possibility of an increased price, and pay from 7 to 10 per cent interest on money. Of course, a great many of them might as well have held their wheat, as they did not get their money, but they did not know this.

I shipped my wheat last November and have not gotten my returns yet. I noticed by comments of the press that there was a slacking up in the flow of wheat, and they laid it to the agitation in Congress for an increased price on the 1918 crop. I sincerely hope that this is the case, but common sense tells me that they are just getting the tail end of the 1917 crop.

I wish to go on record right now (without statistics before me) that we will have to go entirely without white bread months before the new harvest, and that this condition was caused by fixing the price so low on wheat that is was fed promiscuously to domestic animals.

This is a machinery age. And the one spot on earth more than any other to regulate production and prices of farm products is at the offices of the International Harvester Co., at Chicago. The farmer's machinery, made up of steel and cast iron—better than 50 per cent cast iron—costs him from $600 to $900 per ton.

It takes from 3 to 6 bushels of wheat to buy a pair of shoes. I think that Armour and his kind should show a little patriotism, too.

Mr. Wilson says: "To increase the price of wheat would dislocate all the present wage levels."

The Government statistics give 5 bushels of wheat as the average consumption. After careful investiaation I find this a little strong, but, for argument sake, we will admit it. This would be approximately $10 a year at the present price; if we increased the price to $3, it would be $15 a year.

I have out a standing offer right now, in order to contract harvest labor ahead, one year's supply of flour for one and one-half days' work, common labor; one year's supply of flour for one day's work, expert labor.

If by increasing the price of wheat $1 per bushel we could increase the production, so that everyone could have all they wanted, I believe, taking into consideration the price of other foodstuffs, that there are millions of people that would live almost entirely on wheat flour, and they would be more healthy, too.

If this is the case, and they should double their consumption, it would then cost them $30 per year for food.

Very cheap living, is it not?

By increasing the price of wheat so that it would insure an abundance of it being produced, they would lower the cost of living to an extent that would be hard to realize and eliminate untold suffering and hardships.

Mr. Wilson intimates that there are large stores of wheat which will be released at the end of the war. I for one would like to know where these stores of wheat are. Take, for example, the rebellion. I believe I am right in stating that farm products reached their maximum in price about 1867, and it is the general opinion among farmers now that the maximum price for their products will be reached about one year after this war is over.

The present price of wheat is going to cause a tendency among large producers, who are able to, to hoard their wheat until the war is over. And as I stated in my other letter, they are all going to plant anything else wherever they can.

This does not seem patriotic I know, but you have human nature to contend with. Then if you put down the price on all farm products there will be an army of them go to work in other lines of industry or start to breeding cattle to restock Europe with after the war.

Another matter: I understand from the press that the Food Administration has requested the merchants to close early and to go on a cash basis. I suppose their idea is to reduce consumption. It will probably have the desired effect, but at the same time it will reduce production amazingly. They should request the merchants to stay open evenings so that the farmers could go in and get their supplies (which he is allowed to buy only in limited quantities) without using the precious daylight. They should request the merchants and bankers to extend every bit of credit possible to the farmer, who only has a pay day once a year, otherwise he will be compelled to take up some other occupation where he has a pay day every Saturday night.

I tell you, Mr. BORAH, the situation is critical; seeding time is almost here; it requires a hard fight and quick action or we will all be eating something else in the place of good, cheap, white bread. I know that if the price had been fixed on wheat last fall at $3 it would have saved millions of bushels for consumption.

It is my impression that they figure five to the family. At the present price the flour bill is $50 a year, providing they have all they want. Increasing the price $1 a bushel on wheat would increase the cost of flour for a family of five $25 a year.

Don't you suppose that the lack of flour, causing the use of high-priced substitutes, has more than taken up this $25, and the year only half gone?

On the other hand, if by increasing the price of flour 50 per cent you would increase the production so that everyone would have enough and to spare, you would cheapen the cost of living to more than offset the entire flour bill. Do you grasp my meaning?

I now read from a letter from Y. C. Mansfield, of Sunnyside, Wash., a gentleman whom I have the honor to know, a man of wide experience and an accurate observer. I read from his letter:

How thousands of wheat growers are to put in this next spring's crop is hard for me to understand. This morning I tried to buy some feed barley. I was told that I could have some at $80 a ton. I have plenty of wheat feed, but I hate to feed it when it is so badly needed for human food.

My wheat is worth about $60 a ton. One ton of it is equal to a ton and one-half of barley. My son is working 80 head of mules and horses. You can readily see what it would cost that boy to be patriotic and feed barley, which he has to buy, instead of feeding wheat, and yet that is what we are supposed to do.

Now, I want to write you concerning the draft. I have a neighbor joining, farming 500 acres of wheat land. He has three sons; one is already in France, another one has been drafted and put in the first class, although he can only see out of one eye; the third son is not a strong man, not strong enough to run the big machinery needed on a wheat ranch, and yet he will be left alone to run and manage this ranch. I have another neighbor who has a large wheat ranch, who is an old man, and retired. His son is running the ranch. He has a large thrashing outfit and does his own thrashing, and also thrashes for his neighbors. This boy has also been drafted and put in the first class.

I have a son who is running a 3,000-acre farm belonging to his uncle, who is an old man, in poor health, and living in Los Angeles. He has 2,200 acres ready to seed this spring. Three of his best men have been drafted, and he has been drafted and put in the second class, although he has a wife and two little babies. He is risking thousands of dollars in trying to raise an extra large crop so that the hungry may be fed. One thousand acres that he intends to put into wheat, according to the rules of the best farming in this district, should be summer fallowed. With feed grain at $80 a ton, hay at $20 a ton, farming help at $3 a day and board, and we have to feed our work stock about three days for every day's work we get out of them, you can readily see what he is risking in trying to raise more wheat. And yet our Government puts down the price of our wheat, regardless of the cost of production, and puts no limit on what we have to buy or on the men's wages we have to employ.

The wheat growers are paying $3 a day and board, which amounts to about $4 per day. The Government is promising to bring men from the cities to help us with our work. None of our teams are less than four horses and a great many of them are eight. Our machinery is made for these large teams. Not one man in a hundred taken out of the city could drive these teams and handle the machinery on the steep side hills that you know we have to farm on.

I read a paragraph from a public letter by J. F. Fisher, of Rockland, Idaho. There is perhaps no better-informed gentleman in our part of the country with reference to these matters. I read only that portion of the letter which relates particularly to this subject:

In December last I marketed a car of hogs which I fattened on wheat. I noticed the appeal made to feed hogs corn and save wheat. I tried to buy corn to feed them and found that it would cost me $4.25 per hundred, while the wheat cost only $2.25. I would have lost money on those hogs by substitution.

I notice that wheat in Chicago is worth $2.20 per bushel and corn $1.20 per bushel. This is about the same ratio of value that corn has always maintained to wheat, yet locally wheat flour is worth $5.45 per hundred and corn meal is $9 per hundred. I ask you who makes the profit? Who is being exploited under this system?

Last spring every paper you picked up predicted a potato famine, and experts went on record that if every potato in the United States was planted we would still be short in the fall.

I myself sold seed potatoes for $5.50 per hundred, and when the men who planted them dug their potatoes in the fall they could not sell them at all. There was absolutely no market.

You point with pride to a price on wheat of $2.20 Chicago, and you hear a great deal of what it is doing for the wheat farmer. Again I cite my own case. In February, before the war began, I sold my wheat for $2 per hundred. To-day, after deducting the freight to Chicago and the grades, I would get $2.50 per hundred for the same wheat, yet it cost me twice as much in labor cost and food cost to produce that wheat as it did before the war. Again, you lose sight of the hazard of the business. The last two years, in spite of prices, because of increased cost of production and adverse weather conditions, over which I had no control, my farm has shown me an actual loss.

NEITHER SEED NOR CASH.

Now, you say put in every acre. In this community there are thousands of acres of land prepared ready to be planted, but the farmers have not got the seed wheat nor the money to buy it.

You fix the price of seed wheat at 15 per cent above the cost after it is cleaned, yet our local elevators are asking from $3.25 to $3.50 per hundred for spring seed wheat that they paid $2.70 to $2.85 for last fall. I have written to the council of defense and the State farm markets of these conditions, but they have taken no action.

You say the price of wheat will be $2 per bushel in 1918, and the press led the farmer to believe this was at primary shipping points; that is, farmers' point of delivery. Now I gather that your administration designates 12 points as primary markets, several of them on the eastern seaboard, a thousand miles away from the place of production of a single bushel of wheat, in a commercial sense. If that ruling stands, it means that the Northwest, deducting freight and grades, will take for its crop from $1.40 to $1.50 per bushel, or less than wheat was worth before the war, if you consider the increased cost of production.

COSTS HAVE DOUBLED.

In the spring before the war I bought a three-bottom plow for $95. To-day that same plow cost me $170. Then I got the best help for $40 per month. Now I get poor help at from $60 to $80 per month, and it costs me twice as much to feed them.

If a man can not operate a business at a profit he will go out of the business, and unless there is some drastic change at once the wheat farmer will be forced to quit.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, if we can have a price-fixing law for those things which the farmer must necessarily buy, so that they may be controlled proportionately with the prices of the things which he has to sell, I should be entirely content with $2.20 a bushel for wheat; but unless the law is so amended as to incorporate those things, provided we are going to continue the price-fixing proposition at all, I shall vote to increase the price of wheat from $2.20 to $2.50 a bushel.

I shall do so, Mr. President, not simply because it is for the interest of the farmer immediately that it be done, but I shall do so because, in my judgment, it enters into the larger proposition of the successful prosecution of this great enterprise in which we are engaged. I have always believed from the very beginning of the war that the first breakdown in this great conflict will, if any breakdown comes, be in the industrial life and in the agricultural field. The military men who are engaged in taking care of that part of the program will see that we get sufficient men in uniform and that we get sufficient men to the front, but I am afraid they are not disposed to give sufficient attention to those things which are necessary to support the men who are in uniform and who are at the front. It is natural for those who are dealing with that feature of the situation to fasten their time and their attention solely upon the question of man power.

But, Mr. President, this is not, as most previous wars have been, a war merely of armies; it is a war of nations; it is a contention and a conflict between whole peoples, and not merely between great armies.

In former times, until the Revolution in France, wars were carried on by armies, which were often employed and dissociated or disunited in a marked degree at least from the nation itself. The war went forward and the battles were fought without very much strain or without very much readjustment of the national life. But this conflict is distinctly a war between nations. It is one people pitted against another. It calls for the resources and the energies and the powers of the people as a whole. No man in this contest can be indifferent to the situation upon the theory that he is not geared up to some activity in connection with the war. Whether he is upon the farm, in the workshop, in the factory, or in the law office, he is in some measure contributing, if he is doing his duty; or, if he is not doing his duty, he is menacing this great conflict in which we are now engaged. So it is incumbent upon us to see to it that we do not break down industrially and agriculturally, as much as it is to see that we do not fail to supply the proper men at the front in France.

Let us reflect for a minute, Mr. President, upon this situation as it now confronts us. It will appear more conclusively that this is a war between the nations and the question of victory depends upon which is best organized and best united in spirit and in purpose, industrially and economically. That question will determine who shall win this great conflict.

Germany is now in possession of middle Europe. Bulgaria, Roumania, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and a large portion of Russia are as completely a part of the German Empire as if national lines were wiped out. She has already realized one of the great objects and purpose of entering this war, which was to establish a middle Europe, to get control of the vast resources in the center of the Continent, and place herself practically in a fortified fortress in the middle of Europe. That is now largely a realization. While we still speak of Austria-Hungary and Turkey and Bulgaria and Roumania, they are as a matter of fact a part of the German Empire, and all orders proceed from Berlin.

The Kaiser is controlling the destinies of those nations as if they had been incorporated as a part of his Empire. Germany is taking possession day by day of the resources of Russia; she either has, or will have before very many months shall have passed, control of all that portion of Russia which she desires to control. With her capacity for organization, her transcendent aptitude for efficiency, in control of middle Europe, and with the natural resources of Russia behind her, this is not, indeed, a war between armies, but a war of nations. It will be determined according to the manner in which we organize ourselves industrially and agriculturally; how we stand economically, and how, as a people, we are united in spirit and in purpose.

You may put upon the western front all the soldiers that you can build ships to carry, but if there is not behind them a united and determined people, aroused and thoroughly understanding the fact that we are all a part of the contest, we shall not be able to succeed in the end. We could do nothing in this contest that would more discourage the German dynasty than to demonstrate once and for all that we are a thoroughly united people, determined to sacrifice whatever it is necessary to sacrifice in order to crush the military power of that people.

And when we reflect further on some of the issues which are involved in the war, we are again led to understand how conclusively this is a contest between the two systems of government, two civilizations. We ought to get away, if we can, from the idea that it is a conflict over national lines in Europe; that it is a question of the redistribution of territory in Europe; that it is a question of securing compensation for injuries which have been done us; and understand that, whatever the cause was in the beginning, we have now arrived at a point where it is distinctly a conflict between two systems of government, between peoples and nations, and that one or the other will have to go down.

Mr. President, I read yesterday in the New York Times an article appearing within the last 30 days in a leading paper published in Germany, one of the responsible journals of that country, in which it discusses the things that it will be necessary for the United States to concede in the readjustment after the war. Among others, it declares unalterably against the Monroe doctrine, and that neither Germany nor the other European countries with which Germany is associated can longer submit to that doctrine. It also declares against the immigration laws which inhibit certain immigrants coming to this country. Among other things, reading a single extract or two, this article says:

Our leaders builded better than they knew in their decision for unrestricted submarine warfare in that they thus voted that in the name of all Europe our people should confront the Yankeeism hidden in the Monroe doctrine, as if the nations of Europe could in future be excluded from those advantages which Columbus, by his discovery of America, opened up for all time to the civilized world. How little till now has Europe comprehended that the Monroe doctrine in its last analysis signifies nothing less than this.

The war was always, to our way of thinking, a war against America even before it came to the rupture of diplomatic relations and the declaration of a state of war. Nobody doubts that we should have been able much earlier to conclude a favorable peace if the American means of assistance had been at our disposal in the same measure as they have been at the disposal of our enemies or if they had been denied to them as they have been to us. So much more is America, since her openly declared participation in the war, our chief enemy, who alone can galvanize our other enemies to new and bolder resistance. If we can only emerge from this war unvanquished, without giving securities and indemnities, this alone is equivalent to stigmatizing the whole Anglo-Saxon race. The nations who to-day believe in that race will, when they understand this fact, awake from the trance that let them work and fight so long for the Anglo-Saxon world dominion. In a higher sense even this world war is a war for the faith. There will be no salvation for Anglo-Saxon dominion, either in the British Empire or in America if this process of "crushing" miscarries, to say nothing of the result if it ends in a debacle of the entente.

* * * * * * *

The Monroe doctrine in the last analysis is nothing but a transfer of the provincial Anglo-Saxon spirit to the New World. In its name, therefore, the principle has been laid down that emigration from the European continent should be tolerated only so far as it corresponds with the endeavor of the old Anglo-American aristocratic families to be self-sufficient and exclusive.

In this the correct sentiment for a continental European community of interests in opposition to the insularity of the Anglo-Saxon race finds expression. From this it is evident that the German policy of supplanting Anglo-Saxonism from its position of world dominion by Germanism can not be better inducted than by emphasizing with all vigor during the war, and especially at the peace negotiations, the interests of pan-Europe against the Monroe doctrine in so far as this doctrine is intended to create ever new difficulties for the sale of European merchandise in American markets, and above all for the emigration of Europeans to any parts of the New World.

In other words, Mr. President, whatever may have been our opinion in the beginning of the war, both sides realize now that this is not only a war between great nations, involving the interests of all their citizens, but that it is distinctly a war between systems of Government, and it is so recognized.

Mr. President, the German historian, Prof. Meyer, in a book written since the beginning of the war in which he sums up the issues involved, or rather the issue because it all resolves itself into one, uses this language:

The truth of the whole matter undoubtedly is that the time has arrived when two distinct forms of State organization must face each other in a life-and-death struggle.

That is undoubtedly the understanding and belief of those who are responsible for this war. It is coming to be the understanding and belief of those who have had the war forced upon them. We have finally put aside the tragedy at the Bosnian capital and the wrongs inflicted upon Belgium as the moving causes of the war. They were but the prologue to the imperial theme. We now see and understand clearly and unmistakably the cause at all times lying back of these things. Upon the one hand is Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the principles of human liberty which they embody and preserve. Upon the other hand is that peculiar form of State organization which, in the language of the emperor, rests alone upon the strength of the army and whose highest creed finds expression in the words of one of its greatest advocates that war is a part of the eternal order instituted by God. We go back to Runnymede, where fearless men wrenched from the hands of power habeas corpus and the trial by jury. They point us to Breslau and Molwitz, where Frederick the Great, in violation of his plighted word, inaugurated the rule of fraud and force and laid the foundation for that mighty structure whose central and dominating principle is that of power.

It is that power with which we are at war to-day. Shall men, shall the people, be governed by some remorseless and soulless entity softly called the "State" or shall the instrumentalities of government yield alone and at all times to the wants and necessities, the hopes and aspirations of the masses? That is now the issue. Nothing should longer conceal it. It is but another and more stupendous phase of the old struggle, a struggle as ancient and as inevitable as the thirst for power and the love of liberty, a struggle in which men have fought and sacrificed all the way from Marathon to Verdun.

It seems strange now, and it will seem more extraordinary to those who come after us, that we did not recognize from the beginning that this was the issue. But, obscured by the débris of European life, confused with the dynastic quarrels and racial bitterness of the Old World, it was difficult to discern, and still more difficult to realize, that the very life of our institutions was at stake, that the scheme of the enemy, amazing and astounding, was not alone to control territory and dominate commerce, but to change the drift of human progress and to readjust the standards of the world's civilization. Perhaps, too, our love of peace, our traditional friendship for all nations lulled suspicion and discouraged inquiry. Be that as it may, there can be no doubt now. Whatever the cause, however perverse the fates which brings us to this crisis, we are called upon not to settle questions of territory or establish new spheres of national activity, but to defend the institutions under which we live. Who doubts should we fail that the whole theory and system of government for which we have labored and struggled, our whole conception of civilization would be discredited utterly. Who but believes that should we lose militarism would be the searching test of all governments and that the world would be an armed camp harried and tortured and decimated by endless wars. No; we can no longer doubt the issue, and, notwithstanding some discouraging facts, we must not doubt the result. We are simply meeting the test which brave men have met before, for this issue has been fought over and over again for 3,000 years. Islam's fanaticism was grounded in the same design and made of the same stuff, but it broke upon the valor of Charles Martel's men at Tours. But the conflict was not conclusive. The elder Napoleon was obsessed by the same dream of world dominion, the same passion for military glory that now obsesses those against whom we war. But he, too, saw his universal scepter depart when chance and fate which sometimes war on the side of liberty turned from him on the field of Waterloo. And now the issue is again made up, and again this dream of world dominion, this passion for military glory torments the souls of our would-be masters. And now again somewhere on the battle fields of Europe the same fate awaits the hosts of irresponsible power. In such a contest and with such an issue we can not lose; it would not harmonize with the law of human progress.

It has been the proud belief of some that not only would this war result in greater prestige and greater security for free institutions but that it would effectuate the spread of democracy throughout Europe. We all hope for great things, for we believe in the ultimate triumph of free institutions, but we must not expect these things out of hand. The broken sobs of nations struggling to be independent and free so often heard in that part of the world and then heard no more, the story of Russia just now being written in contention and blood admonishes anew that the republican road to safety and stability is encompassed by all kinds of trials and beset by countless perils. Democracy is the severest test of character which can be put upon a people, and must be earned and acquired in the rigid school of experience. It can not be handed whole and complete to any people, though every member of the community were a Socrates. But what we have determined in this crisis, as I understand it, is that we will keep the road of democracy open. No one shall close it. If any nation shall hereafter rise to the sublime requirement of self-government and choose to go that way it shall have the right to do so. Above all things we have determined, cost what it may in treasure and blood, that this experiment here upon this Western Continent shall justify the faith of its builders, that there shall remain here in all the integrity of its powers neither wrenched nor marred by the passions of war from within nor humbled nor dishonored by military power from without the Republic of the fathers. That since the challenge has been thrown down that this is a war unto death between two opposing theories of government we are determined that whatever else happens as a result of this war this form of organization, this theory of state, this last great hope, this fruition of 130 years of struggle and toil "shall not perish from the earth."

So, sir, stripped of all incidental and confusing things, the problem which our soldiers will help to solve is whether the theory of government exemplified in the dynasty of the Hohenzollerns or the theory of government exemplified in the faith of Abraham Lincoln shall prevail. It is after all a war of ideas, a clash of systems, a death struggle of ideals. Amid the sacrilege of war it is our belief that the old order passeth. In such a contest there is little room for compromise. We can no more quit than Washington could have quit at Valley Forge. We can no more compromise than Lincoln could have compromised after Chancellorsville. We can and should keep the issue clear of all selfish and imperialistic ambitions, but the issue itself can not be compromised. Cost what it may in treasure and blood the burden, as if by fate, has been laid upon us, and we must meet it manfully and successfully. To compromise is to acknowledge defeat. The policies of Frederick the Great which would make of all human souls mere cogs in a vast military machine, and the policies of Washington which would make government the expression and the instrument of popular power are contending for supremacy on the battle fields of Europe. Just that single, simple, stupendous issue, beside which all other issues in this war are trivial, must have a settlement as clear and conclusive as the settlement at Runnymede or Yorktown. To lose sight of this fact is to miss the supreme purpose of the war, and to permit it to be embarrassed or belittled by questions of territory is to betray the cause of civilization. And to fail to settle it clearly and conclusively is to fail in the most vital and sublime task ever laid upon a people.

We need not prophesy now when victory will come. Neither is it profitable to speculate how it will come. If it is a real and not a sham peace, we will have no trouble in recognizing it when it does come. Whether it shall come in the bloody and visible triumph of arms or, as we hope, through the overthrow and destruction of militarism by the people of the respective countries, we do not know. But that it will come we confidently believe. Indeed, if the principles of right and the precepts of liberty are not a myth, we know it will come. It has been said by some one that it was not possible for Napoleon to win at Waterloo, not on account of Wellington, not on account of Blucher, but on account of the unchanging laws of liberty and justice. Let us call something of this faith to our own contest. Let us go forward in the belief that it is not possible in the morning of the twentieth century of the Christian civilization for militarism, for brute force, to triumph. It would be in contravention to every law, human and divine, upon which rests the happiness and preservation of the human family. It would be to place brute force first in the divine economy of things. It would be to place might over right, and in the last and final struggle that can not be done. No; we can not lose. We must win. The only question is whether we shall, through efficiency and concerted and united action, win without unnecessary loss of life, unnecessary waste of treasure, or whether we shall, through lack of unity in spirit and purpose, win only after fearful and unnecessary sacrifices.

It has often been said since the war began, Mr. President, that a republic can not make war. I trample the doctrine under my feet. I scorn the faithless creed as the creed of cowards and traitors. If a republic can not make war, if it can not stand the ordeal of conflict, why in the name of the living God are our boys on the western front? Are they there to suffer and die for a miserable craft that can only float in the serene breeze of the summer seas and must sink or drive for port at the first coming on of the storm? No; they are there to defend a craft which is equal to every conflict and superior to every foe—the triumph and the pride of all the barks that have battled with the ocean of time. A republic can make war. It can make war successfully and triumphantly and remain a republic every hour of the conflict. The genius who presided over the organization of this Republic, whose impressive force was knit into every fiber of our national organization, was the greatest soldier, save one, of the modern world, and the most far-visioned leader and statesman of all time. He knew that though devoted to peace the time would come when the Republic would have to make war. Over and over again he solemnly warned his countrymen to be ever ready and always prepared. He intended, therefore, that this Republic should make war and make war effectively, and the Republic which Washington framed and baptized with his love can make war. Let these faithless recreants cease to preach their pernicious doctrine.

Sir, this theory, this belief that a self-governing people can not make war without forfeiting their freedom and their form of government is vicious enough to have been kenneled in some foreign clime. A hundred million people knit together by the ties of a common patriotism, united in spirit and purpose, conscious of the fact that their freedom is imperiled, and exerting their energies and asserting their powers through the avenues and machinery of a representative Republic is the most masterful enginery of war yet devised by man. It has in it a power, an element of strength, which no military power of itself can bring into effect. The American soldier, a part of the life of his Nation, imbued with devotion to his country, has something in him that no system or mere military training and discipline as applied to automatons of an absolute government can ever give. The most priceless heritage which this war will leave to a war-torn and weary world is the demonstrated fact that a free people of a free Government can make war successfully and triumphantly, can defy and defeat militarism and preserve through it all their independence, their freedom, and the integrity of their institutions.

Mr. NORRIS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will yield it is desired to have a short executive session.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield with the understanding that I shall finish to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CAPSTICK, OF NEW JERSEY.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JOHN H. CAPSTICK, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Chair to lay the resolutions before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 18, 1918.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN H. CAPSTICK, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 215.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN H. CAPSTICK, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed by the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the second resolution the Chair appoints the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] as the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 19, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 18, 1918.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 18, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we find ourselves submerged in almost impenetrable darkness, which covers the earth as the waters cover the sea; and we most fervently pray, that it may presage the dawning of a new day, which shall flood the earth with light, warmth, and beauty; bring to men a clearer vision of the larger life, correct mistakes, right all wrongs, banish war, and establish a lasting peace; fructify and replenish the earth with all good; and unite all men and nations in the bonds of brotherly love: "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain."

Our Father, our hearts are touched by the death of a Member of this House who has been taken from the confines of the now to the larger reward in the new life. Comfort us, especially those to whom he was nearest and dearest, by the precious promises of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 16, 1918, was read and approved.

MEMORIAL TO ORDERS OF SISTERS WHO SERVED AS NURSES IN THE CIVIL WAR.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) authorizing the erection of a memorial in Washington to the memory and in honor of the members of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War.

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission to the Ladies' Auxiliary, Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, for the erection on public grounds of the United States of America in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a memorial to the members of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, how long will it take to get through with this resolution?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to forego any privilege of speaking at great length on it, but shall ask to extend my remarks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Has it the unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. It has the unanimous report of the Committee on the Library.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does it cost the Government anything at all?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Absolutely nothing.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would it not be better to let the site be selected by the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. That is provided in the bill as it stands. The bill is safeguarded in that respect.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is provided that they shall select the site?

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Exactly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I had expected to say something in favor of the joint resolution just passed, but in view of the haste of the House I will simply ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the joint resolution just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDUSTRIAL CREDITS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10608) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10608, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10608), which the clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10608) to provide further for the national security and defense and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish the gentleman would withhold it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order, because it will take half an hour to call the roll. We want to adjourn earlier this afternoon than anticipated on account of the death of one of our colleagues.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I trust the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from California is to speak in opposition to the bill, and I thought that a larger audience should be here. But in view of the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina that we are going to adjourn earlier, I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the gentleman also knows that general debate closes when we adjourn, and we want to save all the time we can.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I desire first of all to state that this so-called war-finance bill, as it now appears before this House, is a very different proposition from what it was when it was first introduced. I congratulate the Committee on Ways and Means upon the drastic amendments which they have put upon the bill and which, I think, without a single exception, are very desirable and essential changes. I presume we are all animated with one thought in considering legislation of this kind, and that is to do nothing that will interfere with the most efficient prosecution of the war and the bringing of it to a successful termination at the earliest possible moment. So I appear here as a critic of this legislation, not in a carping spirit, but in a friendly attitude, desiring to further the purpose which this House has in passing or considering this legislation, rather than to thwart it. If anything in the line proposed by this bill is to be done it should be done in the best manner possible; in a way to do as much good and as little harm as possible.

As has already been stated, this legislation would never be considered seriously for a moment, in time of peace, by anyone who understood at all the banking and currency systems of the world and the correct principles underlying them. When our banks and instrumentalities of credit are in first-class condition, when there is no general denial of credit to those who are entitled to it, I can not see why just at this time the established principles controlling matters of this kind should be thrown to the winds and a revolutionary proposition like this should be seriously proposed. This bill proposes something different from anything in the world, or, so far as I know, anything that ever was in the world.

In order that we may consider it in its fundamentals it is necessary to tear away the verbiage that seeks to hide the true meaning and intent of the proposition. A very ingenious camouflage has been incorporated in this bill in the provision that creates a corporation. This creation is not a corporation in any ordinary acceptation of that term; it is not proposed to appeal to the public to put up any of the capital stock of this corporation; private individuals are not invited to become directors or officers of it. It is proposed to create the Secretary of the Treasury and four other men to be appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate in the manner in which public officials are appointed and confirmed under our system, a corporation for the carrying out of the purposes contemplated by this legislation. In other words, the United States is the corporation. The effect would be essentially the same if a bureau of the Treasury were authorized to do eactly what this corporation is authorized to do. It is said, of course, that by the creation of this so-called corporation the Treasury of the United States will not be directly charged with any of the obligations contracted by the corporation. That would be technically correct, probably, but the corporation being managed by the Secretary of the Treasury and four other officials appointed by the Government, the Government certainly would be morally responsible for any of its obligations, and I can not see the advantage in this round-about fashion of putting the United States of America into the loaning business, into the banking business. I do not see the gain in it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be the gentleman's idea that if we were going to do what this bill authorizes the board to do we should do it direct out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HAYES. Why not? The bill proposes this in substance. The mere legal fiction of appointing a corporation made up of the Secretary of the Treasury and four officers of the Government does not change the real status of things at all. The Government is to put up all the money that constitutes its capital stock; to appoint in the usual way of appointment of Federal officials all of its directors, officers, and employees, and to do all its business.

Mr. MADDEN. Except in the establishment of a precedent, perhaps.

Mr. HAYES. The precedent that will be established will be equally dangerous in either case. I do not know how the gentlemen from Illinois views this sort of thing, but I am objecting, as I always have objected since I have been a Member of this House, to the Government of the United States making loans of the money collected from all the people to private business, big or little, and I am still opposed to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from California that sooner or later all of the securities that may be taken by this corporation for moneys advanced will find their way into the regional reserve banks and have circulating medium issued with these securities as a basis?

Mr. HAYES. In reply to the gentleman I would say that there would be no possible way that I can see for floating the vast amount of securities proposed by this bill except through the banks and the Federal reserve banks, and I have no doubt that if this bill becomes a law a very large percentge of them will find their way into the Federal reserve banks and notes will be issued upon them—unless, of course, the Federal Reserve Board, as I hope the bill authorizes them to do, although I am a little doubtful about it—should turn their faces sternly against anything of the kind.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill does authorize the Federal Reserve Board to permit the acceptance of the securities taken by the corporations?

Mr. HAYES. It does.

Mr. MADDEN. As a basis for the issue of such circulating medium?

Mr. HAYES. It does, and without any limit.

Mr. MADDEN. The limit, of course, would be the extent of the obligations—that is, the $2,000,000,000.

Mr. HAYES. Yes; but it does not limit the percentage of the obligations that are issued that may be used for that purpose. Let us not deceive ourselves. I think it is well if we are to support this proposition to know what it is. This bill creates a great central bank. That is all it is. It makes the Government put up the money to run it. It is run by officials of the Government of the United States—a great national central loaning institution, to lend money on the security of such stocks and bonds as may be approved by the corporation to private corporations and to individuals.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like the opinion of the gentleman from California as to the safeguards that surround the public interests through this corporation now as compared with the safeguards that appeared when the bill was first presented.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman from Illinois was not on the floor when I began. I stated that this bill had been in all respects, where any changes had been made, vastly improved. It is not the same proposition at all as it was when he and I appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means to discuss it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman states that this is to all intents and purposes a great central bank.

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The subterfuge comes in the pretense that it is not a central bank of the United States.

Mr. HAYES. That is it, but it is a central bank.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the securities to be sent out will apparently appear not secured by the United States itself.

Mr. HAYES. They will not be according to the technical legal fiction attempted by the bill, but the United States will be behind it morally; and should this corporation be a failure financially and incur obligations that it could not pay, I hope that no one in the world thinks for a moment that this Congress would consent, or that the people of the United States would ever consent, with the Secretary of the Treasury and four other directors appointed by the President and approved by the Senate at the head of it, that these obligations should be repudiated by the Government of the United States. Every American, I believe, would blush at such a thought, and I am sure nothing of that kind will ever be done.

Mr. MADDEN. With the further appointment of a board to pass upon the securities that may be issued.

Mr. HAYES. That is a part that I have not time to discuss.

Mr. MADDEN. However, it is part of the scheme.

Mr. HAYES. I have no objection to a proper provision of that kind, but I shall have no time to discuss it. Now, this great central bank is brought forward here and urged upon this House and upon the Congress of the United States by the party in power. I just for a moment desire to call their attention to the history of the Democratic Party and to the history of this country, as affected by that party. I believe it was in 1832 that Andrew Jackson sent to the House of Representatives his famous message vetoing the bill which had passed Congress to renew the charter of the United States Bank, and in that message he pointed out the dangers of that kind of thing. Although the United States Bank at that time had only $14,000,000 of capial, provided entirely by private individuals, he pointed out the opportunity of using in politics the great power and influence which so much money in the hands of men at the seat of government gave them. He did not charge that up to that time the bank or its officials had corruptly or improperly used that power, but he said it was dangerous to give men, even indirectly connected with the Government in this free land such great powers as the possession and control of such a vast sum of money would give to them. When the bank officials found that their charter was to be taken from them, they proposed that a majority of the directors should resign and Jackson's political partisans appointed in their places. But this did not change the attitude of the incorruptible old hero at all. After the election of 1832 or 1834 he removed the deposits from the United States Bank, and he at that time charged them with improperly using their money or the influence and power that the United States Government had bestowed upon them for political purposes. I wonder what Andrew Jackson would think could he step in here to-day and see his professed followers proposing to create a United States Bank, not with $14,000,000 capital to be furnished by private individuals, but with $500,000,000 to be furnished by the Government of the United States; a capital for a bank, the largest that was ever thought of in the history of the world. What would he think about such a proposal? Do you believe that he would think that there was here no opportunity for the abuse of power, no danger of its being used for political purposes? Why, I do not care if an angel from heaven should run this corporation there will be all sorts of criticisms and complaints that not only favoritism has been used, but that political considerations have governed it.

The confidence of some of the people in their Government will be destroyed and their patriotism correspondingly decreased, because all of those who make application can not receive the bounty and assistance of this corporation, and those who are denied will feel that they are just as much entitled to the consideration of the corporation and the Government of the United States as those who are favored. We can easily conjecture what the result would be.

Now, I would not be here criticizing this bill if there were not other and, in my judgment, much better and saner ways to reach the same result.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman have any objection to an interruption?

Mr. HAYES. I would not.

Mr. GARNER. Would it disconcert the gentleman's argument now to state concretely the method the gentleman would use to relieve the situation?

Mr. HAYES. I intend to do so before I am through. I first desire to speak briefly of the purposes of this corporation. It is proposed by this legislation that there shall be loaned to corporations and individuals by this corporation not only the $500,000,000, which the Government of the United States puts up under its provision, but that the credit of the United States shall be loaned to the extent of $2,000,000,000 in addition, whereas the Senate bill provides, if it is proper for me to speak of it, for $4,000,000,000. The committee has cut that down to $2,000,000,000, but it is reasonable to presume that the bill will come out of the conference with the amount somewhere between the two.

Mr. GARNER. Is that altogether an accurate statement to say that the Government is loaning its credit to the extent of $2,000,000,000 or $4,000,000,000 when the Government does not assume responsibility for these loans?

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman was not on the floor when I discussed that. I say the Government must assume the responsibility because the Secretary of the Treasury and four officials appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate are to administer it, and I can not conceive Congress or the Government of the United States ever trying to avoid its responsibility under those circumstances.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In other words, the Government either nominally must do it or else stand ready at any time to repudiate its part of it.

Mr. HAYES. Absolutely; one or the other. Now, what is the proposition in this legislation? It is proposed, in the first place, that this corporation should loan this money and its credit first to banks and trust companies; secondly, to saving banks and other banks with savings deposits and building and loan associations; thirdly, directly to corporations and individuals. Now, as I said in the beginning or near the beginning, there are ways in which this could be done and all of these things can be accomplished without drawing upon the Treasury for a cent, without creating any camouflage revolutionary corporation like that proposed by this bill. Other nations have done it, they are still doing it, why can not we? The great banks of the country, the commercial banks, are fuller of deposits than they have ever been in our history; fuller than any other banking system in the history of the world ever was. I have studied these statistics and I do not find that the bank deposits are diminishing; on the contrary, since the beginning of the war they are increasing. I do not find that the deposits in the saving banks are diminishing, though they are not increasing at the same ratio as the commercial deposits, but they are not decreasing.

There is nothing in this certainly to give us any financial alarm that I can see. For one, it seems to me that it would be wise to wait before we pass such revolutionary legislation as this until there is pressing and certain need for it. And if out of abundance of caution we think it necessary to do something to strengthen the situation and to give confidence to the public, especially to the investing public, let us do it in a way that will not plague us after the war is over. During the War between the States the national banking act was passed, giving the privilege to the banks to buy United States bonds and to issue currency upon them, something that no nation ever tried before, and a thing that every student of the subject will agree makes a very imperfect currency system. And that unsound legislation has been plaguing us ever since. It is still with us after 50 years and more.

And the legislation before us, in my opinion, if it becomes a law and the Government of the United States proceeds according to it and makes the loans that are provided for to the exent that they are permitted, will be here to plague us for the next 25 years and perhaps longer, when it is not necessary, in my judgment, at all.

Now, so far as loaning direct to individuals is concerned, as all the older Members of the House know, I have always, as a Member of this House and as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency fought all such propositions. I believe that the Government of the United States should not go into the money-loaning business. I believe that it is not necessary for the Treasury of the United States thus to be opened to any of the business interests of this country in this direct way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is opposed to this bill and is in favor of extending such credits as may be necessary for war purposes through the regular system of Federal reserve banks?

Mr. HAYES. And the banks generally.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the banks generally?

Mr. HAYES. Absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That question was thoroughly discussed before the committee, and it was indicated once, if

I recall, by one of the witnesses who came before the committee, that there were certain banks and bankers who imposed rates of interest so high as to make it impossible for certain industries to obtain loans and continue the business they were doing in connection with the war.

Mr. HAYES. I have heard that statement. But the gentleman, if he will read the daily reports of the business done in New York and other large cities, will see that the rates of interest are not high in any of the commercial centers of this country. Five per cent and six per cent on commercial loans is not excessive. And if anybody has been charged excessive interest it is because their security or personal responsibility are not such as to recommend them to the banks or to those who have money to loan. [Applause.] The Government of the United States can not afford to back up a man or a corporation whose credit is such that 10 or 15 per cent interest must be paid in order to get an accommodation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that in the vaults of various banks throughout the country there are long-term securities now, some of them liberty bonds, which are not just as liquid as might be desired by the banks for the transaction of current business. Does the gentleman think that any relief should be afforded to those banks by an expansion of credit, as it were, by which they could utilize these long-term securities?

Mr. HAYES. I do, and I am going to state how I would extend that relief. I would extend it just as other nations extend it, and I will explain how that is done.

Now, what is the justification—because I desire to impugn nobody's motive or their good faith in this matter—what is the justification for this revolutionary legislation? The justification is that it is necessary in order to finance the war, in order to loan money that can not otherwise be secured by individuals and corporations who are manufacturing munitions and furnishing supplies for the Government in the progress of the war. And the terms of the bill limit it, if I am not mistaken in my memory, to those concerns that have been going since the beginning of the war—nearly a year.

In the first place, any corporation, manufacturing establishment, or individual who has been furnishing the Government with any supplies during the last year at the enormous profits and prices that they have had and that is in a position where it can not get such accommodations as it needs through the banks of this country, loaded as they are with deposits, are probably not entitled to it at all. They are doing their business in a manner or they are men of a character that should not be assisted by the Government of the United States to carry on or to enlarge their business. I have been in business a great many years, and I never found a time yet, except during the panic of 1893, when, if I had the securities, to say nothing about my responsibility, I could not find a banker in the United States that would loan me the money that I needed to carry on my business, no matter how big it was or how big I thought it wise to make it. And I undertake to say that no man who desires to do a business in the United States in the furnishing of munitions or supplies will go without the necessary assistance if he is entitled to it, and especially if he is to have or has a contract with the Government of the United States at this time to do anything that the Government needs to have done. I say that there will be plenty of men that will be glad to back up such a man and give him all the financial assistance that he needs; and it will not be necessary for the Government of the United States to appropriate $500,000,000, or any other sum, to induce him to do it. If this is not so, then this country is in a terrible condition; that is all, because other countries do it; and the patriotism and the enterprise and the energy of the United States citizen is not below that of any other citizenship in the world, in my estimation. [Applause.]

Now, when we leave those forms of industries that contribute directly to the prosecution of the war, then we must have in view practically all the other industries of the country, because they all contribute. We can not win this war unless the great industries and the small industries of the country are prosperous.

Unless the people are producing something, how in the world are they to buy these bonds that we must sell? How are they to pay their taxes unless the industries of the country are going forward, at least most of them, with as great energy and success as in time of peace? There never was a time in this country when production was at the high stage that it is to-day. If that is so, where is the pressing need for this great expenditure of money on the part of the Government of the United States to assist independent, energetic citizens of the United States in the conduct of private business in this country?

Mr. WELTY. Does the gentleman know whether other countries loan their credit in matters of this kind by legislation of this kind?

Mr. HAYES. They have not, to my knowledge.

Mr. GLASS. On that point, while I am not insensible to the saneness of what my colleague is saying, does he not know, as a matter of fact, that this Government and every other belligerent Government; that is, of the major nations, have loaned directly millions upon millions of dollars, hundreds of millions of dollars, to private contractors before they had ever broken the earth for their plants?

Mr. HAYES. They make advances to those who have contracts with the Government.

Mr. GLASS. On their plants.

Mr. HAYES. Yes; they make advances.

Mr. GLASS. You would not infer so from what the gentleman has said.

Mr. HAYES. That is quite a different matter from making direct loans to corporations and individuals who are not carrying out contracts for the Government. I am now speaking of those that are not directly connected with the prosecution of the war. They make advances to those who are directly connected, it is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. In that connection, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that our own Government, through the large funds placed at the disposal of the War Department and the Navy Department, has been making advances to various industries in carrying on the war?

Mr. HAYES. It has.

Mr. STAFFORD. To the extent of millions and millions of dollars?

Mr. GLASS. That is what I said. Great Britain and this country and Germany are doing that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman to say other countries besides our own. I did not know that he included our own.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. There is no question about that.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Will it not be one of the effects of this bill that these various industries will be better enabled to buy bonds and speed up their industries by securing loans of this kind at low rates of interest? And is not that one of the very purposes of the bill?

Mr. HAYES. I do not see how they will. They can secure all the loans they need now at reasonable rates of interest, and I will show directly, I hope, how this bill will interfere with the prosecution of the war. How are these bonds to be floated? Who is going to take them? Somebody must buy them. Where is this $500,000,000 that is to be paid by the Treasury to come from? It must come from the taxes or bonds sold by the Government to the people. That $500,000,000 used in the prosecution of the war would go some distance toward helping to carry it on, and the two or four billions of these securities that would be issued by this so-called corporation will compete directly with the bonds issued by the Treasury; and it is proposed to issue them at a higher rate of interest, so that it is quite likely that investors will be much more ready to take them than they will be to take the bonds bearing a lower rate of interest issued directly by the Government.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. If they would put the interest rate higher now they would be taken?

Mr. HAYES. These Government bonds?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. Certainly; and at a lower rate of interest than they can be sold through this camouflage corporation; and, as I have already pointed out, the moral obligation upon the Government is the same as is the obligation for its own bonds, and this increased rate of interest will cost the Government of the United States a great sum of money before we are through with it, in my estimation. It seems to me, therefore, that instead of this corporation assisting in the prosecution of the war, by putting out bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the bonds issued and sold by the Government of the United States it will interfere with the prosecution of the war; and this $500,000,000 that is to be loaned out, instead of being used in the prosecution of the war, after it has been collected from our people in excessive taxes, or by selling bonds to our citizens, will be used for other purposes. In my judgment, it should be used for the purpose for which it was collected, and that is the direct prosecution of the war, and it should not be loaned out to the great business interests of the country, which, I believe, are amply able to take care of themselves.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I do.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You were speaking of advances to industries filling war contracts?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Have we not already enacted legislation providing that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may advance to such contractors 30 per cent of their contracts?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; and they have done it in many cases. I do not mean that they have always done it, but they have done it in many cases.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. I have received a great many letters from constituents in my district wanting relief from the excess-profits tax and an extension of time six months longer. I am informed that the Secretary of the Treasury says it can not be granted; that he must have the money in payment in June. Why is it that these small taxpayers must pay promptly while $500,000,000 of this money is to be used by the big interests of the country? Why must they be given this relief, and no relief given to the citizens who want some temporary relief, although they do not ask for exemption from the payment of their taxes?

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman can answer that question as well as I can. I have already hinted that I think this law could not possibly be administered in a perfectly equitable manner. Some one has to decide which one of the interests will be favored, which individual citizen or corporation shall be allowed the credit it proposes, and which one shall be denied, and there can not help but be inequities in it.

There will be charges of favoritism. There will no doubt be favoritism, because everybody is human and every man will favor his friend before he will favor his enemy. He will favor those whom he desires to assist rather than those that he is opposed to assisting. Everybody would do it. Everybody knows it. So that is one of the things that this measure will bring into the governmental system of the United States. I believe in leaving the loaning of money to the business interests of the country whose business it is to loan money. The Government of the United States is not organized to make a successful national bank or central bank. They have not the force and personnel, now skilled and ready by years of experience, to administer a great loaning system like this—the force such as the banks of the United States have to administer such a system in a business way. Such a system must be administered by men who have had years of experience, who have come up from the ranks and have had experience all along the line. These are the men who are managing the great banks and loaning institutions of the country, and the Government of the United States has no such force.

Besides all that, there is no public official charged with such vast and numerous responsibilities as the Secretary of the Treasury, and who must now be obliged to spread himself out very thin, that can sufficiently devote himself to this business to make a success of it. It can not be done. It is bound to be expensive to the United States. Inevitably many mistakes will be made. It can not be otherwise. I am not saying this in criticism of the Secretary of the Treasury, and least of all in criticism of the President of the United States, because neither of them can give any personal supervision to the operation of the proposed bank, except in the most cursory and superficial manner.

Some bureaucrat not directly responsible to the people will have to decide the questions that come up for decision in the administration of this great business. He will decide who is to receive the favor of the Government and who is not; and as is done in all similar cases, the Secretary of the Treasury, or even the full board of directors of the corporation will approve his decisions, if these come to them at all, in only the most perfunctory and routine way.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HAYES. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman inform the committee, if it is known, who are likely to compose this board of four men?

Mr. HAYES. I have no more knowledge than the gentleman has.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In the case of the Food Administration bill, we knew beforehand that Mr. Hoover was to be appointed. I thought it might be illuminating if we knew beforehand who were to be the wise four, who were to enlighten the pathway of business.

Mr. HAYES. I have no knowledge on that subject. The truth is, that this Government has been going so rapidly toward paternalism, as it was called in the older days, that it is impossible to estimate the pace at which we are traveling. If we keep on with legislation of this character it will not be long until the Government of the United States will not only be handling the railroads, will not only be handling all the transportation of the country, but will be doing all the other business that amounts to anything in this country. For one, I shall continue to use whatever influence I have against this tendency. I do not believe in paternalism. I do not believe in socialism. I believe that this country is what it is because of the individual liberty and initiative that have been allowed to the individual citizen, and I want to see that system continued. I do not want to see things like this, that will create precedents that will come back to plague us for the next hundred years, put upon the statute books because we are in a state of war and have an emergency upon our hands, when my mind is not convinced that there are not other and better ways to accomplish the desired results.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is aware that every one of these new governmental corporations and bureaus publishes and sends out under frank, either daily or weekly, a newspaper which contains what it pleases to print, and at the same time the Government exercises a censorship on privately owned newspapers.

Mr. HAYES. I know that.

Mr. BURNETT. I believe my colleague voted for the Farm Loan System, did he not?

Mr. HAYES. Is the gentleman referring to the last farm-loan proposition?

Mr. BURNETT. I am speaking of the original farm-loan proposition. And was not that passed in time of peace?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; but the Government of the United States does not loan money to the farmer under the Farm Loan System. The Government only established the 12 farm-loan banks, which are to be financed by the sale of their bonds, based upon the real estate mortgages which the banks take from the farmers to secure the loans made to them. That is very different from the bill under consideration. I see no similarity between them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is making a very strong statement of his views, and he just now spoke of the danger of paternalism in this sort of legislation. May I say to the gentleman that my principal reason for being in favor of this bill is that, in my judgment, it will prevent that kind of paternalism which he fears and which I fear. I fear that without this bill it may be necessary for the Government to take over not only the railroads, but even the private corporations.

Mr. HAYES. I can not discuss that with the gentleman now, for I have not time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think that is one of the most important features of the bill.

Mr. HAYES. That is decidedly not my view of it. Now, I have another objection to this bill which to me is very fundamental. That is, that the bill seems to contemplate that the $500,000,000 to be supplied by the Government of the United States, or so much of it as is actually paid in, is first to be loaned out entirely, and that then the credit of the United States, or of this corporation, may be drawn upon. There is no provision here for any reserve fund by which this corporation would be able to meet its obligations as they mature. If that policy is pursued by the governor and board of directors of the corporation, the result will be that they will be coming here repeatedly for assistance from the Congress of the United States. If this bill is to become a law, I believe there should be a provision in it—and I shall offer such an amendment at the proper time—for a reserve fund to be kept in the treasury of this corporation to meet its obligations as they mature. No loaning institution in the world that I ever heard of was ever successfully carried on unless it had such a reserve fund, and nearly all the statutes in this country which provide for banking or loaning institutions provide for such a fund in order that the corporation may be able upon demand to meet its obligations as demands are made upon it. There is no such provision in this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I understood the gentleman to make the statement that under the provisions of this bill the corporation has got to loan out its capital stock before it can issue securities. Did the gentleman mean to convey that impression?

Mr. HAYES. No; I did not say that. I said the bill seemed to contemplate that. There is no direct provision to that effect.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that there is no such provision.

Mr. HAYES. I do not say there is. In fact, I do not understand it that way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Most of the loaning will be by way of buying the bonds; and the amount of bonds to be issued, as provided in the bill, depends on the amount of actual cash paid in. It can issue only an amount equal to four times the amount of capital actually paid in. If the Government should pay in the whole $500,000,000, then it would be authorized under the bill to issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds; but if it is paid in in installments of, say, $100,000,000, when the first $100,000,000 is paid in it would be authorized to issue only $400,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. HAYES. But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] individually, at least, would not object to a provision in the bill that would require a certain percentage at least of cash that was paid in to be kept as a reserve fund as a matter of safety?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should not think it was necessary, under the provisions of the bill, for that to be done.

Mr. HAYES. I think it is.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would not be needed, because they would have the securities.

Mr. HAYES. The securities might not be sufficiently liquid so that they could be sold quickly enough to meet the demands that might be made on the corporation.

Mr. KITCHIN. The only thing the corporation would be interested in selling in the first instance would be its bonds.

Mr. HAYES. I know, but they are coming due——

Mr. KITCHIN. In from one year to five.

Mr. HAYES. Suppose they are issued for one year, and the one year rolls around.

Mr. KITCHIN. The notes and securities given for these bonds will be payable in less time than that.

Mr. HAYES. True, but the interest has to be paid.

Mr. KITCHIN. And if the notes are not paid the securities can be foreclosed.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman suggest in a general way how he would provide for it?

Mr. HAYES. I am just proceeding to do that now.

Now, I do not want to be here as a critic of this legislation without having something tangible and practical to propose. What I should do if left to me in this emergency would be to amend the Federal reserve act slightly, so that the necessary relief could be handled through that institution. I know that some of its friends—and it has no greater friend on this floor than I am—will object to that, but every central bank in the world extends accommodations to individuals and to corporations upon paper secured by collateral security. Even the central bank in Germany, which insists on its notes being based on short-time commercial paper, makes rediscounts on paper secured by collateral security. So does the Bank of England. So does the Bank of France, and every other central bank or reserve institution in all the world.

The Government of the United States, since I have been a Member of Congress, appointed a nonpartisan monetary commission, having upon it some of the best financial ability from both political parties, provided for the rediscount of loans secured by collateral security.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Will my colleague state to the House what is the duration of the current loans by the Reischsbank?

Mr. HAYES. I have not seen it lately, but the duration is usually very short.

Mr. GLASS. It is only 28 days.

Mr. HAYES. They discourage that sort of thing.

Mr. GLASS. But I thought that the gentleman said, or I inferred from the tenor of his remarks, that the central bank of Germany encouraged loans of this kind.

Mr. HAYES. No; that is not true. The Reischsbank discourages such rediscounts, but they have always, in time of peace and war, constituted a large per cent of its business.

Mr. GLASS. Is it not a literal fact that the Government of Germany has established just such a system as is proposed here now, a war finance corporation, under which it has already issued $5,000,000,000 of national paper money?

Mr. HAYES. It has organized some such corporation, but it is not a Government corporation, financed by the Government; it is a private corporation.

Now, the way to provide for the emergency, in my judgment, is to amend the Federal reserve act so that, during the war only, in a certain contingency the Federal reserve bank might discount at least the direct obligation of the member banks when secured by collateral for a short time only. The provision of the monetary commission was that only when the central bank therein proposed thought that the public interests required it, and when approved directly by the Secretary of the Treasury, should such loans be made. Now, where is the unsoundness to permit this sort of thing to be done whenever the Federal Reserve Board thought that the public interests required it and their judgment is directly and affirmatively approved by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman proposes, after stating his opposition to the present plan, to meet the situation by extending the Federal reserve act to permit the issuance of notes——

Mr. HAYES. No.

Mr. WINGO. Well, I withdraw that which proposes to amend it so that the Federal reserve bank can discount the paper with this as a collateral.

Mr. HAYES. That is the proposition.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman explain what will be the difference in effect of doing that and what is proposed by this bill?

Mr. HAYES. I will if the gentleman does not see it. There is a vast difference. I would not permit the banks to issue notes on such paper, but would only rediscount and give a credit balance.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Could not the credit balance be instantly transformed into currency?

Mr. HAYES. It could not if the law did not permit it.

Mr. GLASS. But it is automatic.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Is there not as much danger from credit inflation as there is from currency inflation?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; and more is to be feared from credit inflation, because such inflation is more insidious; it is not generally known by the people at large, unfil its evil effects appear.

Mr. GLASS. What is the benefit of it if it could not be transferred into currency?

Mr. HAYES. There is plenty of currency. There is no trouble about that. More currency can be issued than the country would demand, as the law now is. We have $2,400,000,000 in gold in the Treasury of the United States, more than half of it now belonging to the Federal reserve banks, and another billion outside. Upon that we can base all the currency and credit necessary to do the business of this country. England, with scarcely a quarter of that amount, has been able to do all that it has done; raised and spent $28,000,000,000 since the beginning of the war, and in spite of that wonderful expenditure the notes of the Bank of England are at par everywhere in the world, and sterling exchanged is at par all over the world. Can we not do as well? They have not been obliged to organize any such "camouflage" proposition as this in order to do it. Neither need we. We can use the agencies and instrumentalities that we have, and with all of this gold in our possession, the like of which was never seen in the history of the world, for no nation in the world ever had a billion dollars in its reserve institutions or central bank, while here in the Treasury of the United States we have to-day $2,402,000,000 of gold—and can we not, with all that gold, do just as well as England?

Mr. GLASS. But to whom does that gold belong? That does not belong to the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. HAYES. Of course it does not.

Mr. GLASS. It does not belong to the Government of the United States. It belongs to the people who hold the gold certificates.

Mr. HAYES. All right. The gold certificates can be retired and the gold can become the basis of credit, as it should be.

Mr. GLASS. How are you going to get the gold in the United States Treasury except by seizure?

Mr. HAYES. Why, the gentleman knows that the Secretary of the Treasury can put it out any time he chooses.

Mr. GLASS. Put it out for something.

Mr. HAYES. Deposit it with the Federal reserve banks or with any bank he wants to put it, even pay it out on Government contracts. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. WINGO. Here is one thing that I am trying to get at. As I understand the gentleman, he has gone on and made certain objections to this plan, and among them were these: That you were going to undertake to permit a great reservoir of credit to be absorbed by big business, with the Government backing it up. That is one objection.

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Another objection is that you have an inflation of credit.

Mr. HAYES. I have not said so, but of course this is a great inflation measure. It may be that in this crisis we shall not be able to prevent inflation, but I want it on the safest basis that we can get it on.

Mr. WINGO. Will there be any difference in the volume of credits outstanding under this bill and under the gentleman's plan?

Mr. HAYES. That all depends on how the corporation is managed.

Mr. WINGO. That applies in every case. If you have it issued under the supervision of one corporation or under the supervision of another corporation, will not the effect on the credits of the country be the same?

Mr. HAYES. No; because under the plan I suggest they will be issued on a business basis, along the regular lines that we have every day in time of peace, and the other will be along extraordinary lines by men who can not be familiar with the great task they will be called upon to perform.

Mr. WINGO. The Federal Reserve System is established for the prime purpose of meeting the credit need of the country. Would not the gentleman destroy that and turn it into a system to furnish credits for the investment of the country instead of the current business?

Mr. HAYES. No; I would not. I would only give short-time loans, as I would in any other case. This Federal Reserve System has been heralded all over the country as a great system, as a great creation, which I also claim, but it is created to meet emergencies as they arise in the history of the country. When an emergency arises, if we have to go outside of the Federal Reserve System in order to finance our industries and keep our corporations and manufacturing establishments running, then this great praise that the Federal Reserve System has received is not fully justified; but I do not believe it. I say that if it is handled right and the gold we have in this country is handled right and our resources and everything that we have in this country are handled as other nations handle theirs there is no need of this sort of thing at all. We can take care of this war and prosecute it and spend any amount that may be necessary, and there will not be any trouble about people getting all of the assistance and all of the credit to which they are entitled. That is my judgment.

Mr. GLASS. The Federal Reserve System I submit was not established to meet emergencies based on absolutely unsound financial operations. And so far from having transactions contemplated by this bill carried through the Federal Reserve System as normal transactions, the Banking and Currency Committee has proposed, and the Ways and Means Committee has accepted, a proposition to apply a differential tax upon these transactions and not let them go into the Federal Reserve System except upon a penalty.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman knows that I approve of that.

Mr. GLASS. But the gentleman is arguing now directly against that sort of proposition.

Mr. HAYES. No; the gentleman does not understand me. I am not in favor of making loans like the loans made or proposed by this corporation through the Federal reserve banks. I am not in favor of making any loans of that sort through the Government or the Federal reserve banks, either, I do not believe it is necessary, at least it is not now necessary. If the time should come in the prosecution of this war when it is necesssary to put the whole force and credit of the Government behind the industries of the country, I should not hesitate to do this, because I feel that every American desires above all things that this Government may bear itself with honor and come out of this war with credit to itself and to its citizenship, and, if possible, secure the results that we are fighting for. [Applause.]

But I think we have not come to the point yet where that is necessary, and I would postpone it to the farthest day; at least I would hesitate to do things that I know are unsound, that I know nobody would think of doing in time of peace, that I know will plague us in the future, no matter how wisely they may be administered, until the pressing need is upon us.

Mr. GARD. But it seems to me that the gentleman is proposing to tie up to the Federal Reserve System the very unsound propositions that he is criticizing.

Mr. HAYES. No; I am not. I am proposing to modify the Federal Reserve System to the extent that will put it upon the same basis with all other reserve systems. I am proposing to grant to them the same privileges only that are granted to all other reserve systems in the world and under the same restrictions and safeguards that the Monetary Commission proposed in its report to the Congress of the United States some eight years ago. I can not see that there will be any different effect upon the Federal Reserve System, whether the Federal reserve banks are allowed to discount the obligations of the banks and trust companies secured by collateral or whether this proposed corporation issues its bonds for these obligations of the banks and trust companies and then such obligations, secured by the bonds of the corporation, are allowed to be discounted by the Federal reserve banks. The difference, so far as the effect upon the reserve banks is concerned, is only a difference between tweedledee and tweedledum. To do it in the direct way that I suggest will remove the necessity for this expensive corporation, with its unsoundness and defects, some of which I have tried to point out. The following is my suggestion in concrete form:

That section 13 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end of said section the following:

"Provided further, That during the period of the present war with Germany and for six months thereafter only, and under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, whenever in the opinion of such board the public interests so require, such opinion to be expressly concurred in by the Secretary of the Treasury, any Federal reserve bank may discount the direct obligations of member banks when accompanied by adequate collateral security, such obligations having a maturity of not more than 90 days, exclusive of days of grace. Such collateral security shall consist only of such bonds or stocks as shall be approved from time to time by the Federal Reserve Board and shall be accepted as such security at not more than 75 per cent of its actual market value."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be advised when I have spoken 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder the committee is concerned over this bill. It is a most unusual measure. It is extraordinary, and would not have been thought of or considered except for the emergency of the war. It could not have had the sanction of the Congress except as a war measure. As to this, at the outset of my remarks, I am obliged to take friendly issue with my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, concerning the "unanimity" with which he said this bill was passed by the Committee on Ways and Means and brought into the House. It is true the Republican minority did not oppose this measure. It labored with members of the majority to bring forth——

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman must either have misconstrued what I said or I must have said something I did not intend to say. But what I did say or intended to say and what is a fact is that this measure was reported unanimously as the wisest measure, in our judgment, under the circumstances. It was voted on and reported out purely as an emergency measure, a war measure, and I think I said that no man on the committee and perhaps no man in the House could favor such a bill or the principles of such a bill in time of peace, and it could only be justified as an extraordinary measure in this extraordinary war. I have not seen anybody here or elsewhere who would indorse the principles of this bill as a permanent measure, as a measure in time of peace. This was the thought entertained by all the committee, both Democrats and Republicans. That was what I intended to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is pleasing to have the gentleman from North Carolina make that statement, because, at the outset of his remarks presenting this measure, the impression prevailed that the minority of the Ways and Means Committee had, in a measure, tumbled over itself to be with the majority to secure its passage. That, of course, was not the fact, and I am very glad to have the gentleman from North Carolina confirm my statement.

The truth of the matter is that both Democrats and Republicans on the Committee on Ways and Means felt that a tremendous responsibility was being placed upon them. They weighed this matter carefully for weeks, doing the best they cculd as patriotic American citizens to respond to what appeared to be a Government need in this regard. It was a case of doing that which was best; not that which was politic only, but that which was patriotic and best under the circumstances. For such reasons the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means, as I believe, agree to permit this bill to come upon the floor without an adverse report.

I repeat, it is an extraordinary measure. As originally presented to the House by the gentleman from North Carolina, the bill contained a preamble that epitomizes its purposes better, perhaps, than any of the witnesses have done. It reads:

That for the purposes of affording financial assistance, either directly or indirectly—

Bear this in mind and appreciate the significance of it—to persons, firms, corporations, and associations whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war in cases where such persons, firms, corporations, or associations shall be unable to procure funds—

Unable to procure funds, remember—

on reasonable or practical terms from the general public or through the regular banking channels, and for the purposes of regulating and controlling the sale or subscription of securities hereinafter authorized, and for other purposes in aiding the war—

And so forth. It was in the minds of the gentlemen at the Treasury Department who framed this bill that the corporation to be created should have the power to raise money to be loaned, to banking institutions, yes; to Federal reserve banks, yes; and private bankers, and also to individuals, firms, and corporations who could not obtain funds through banking channels in the ordinary way to conduct business for the purpose of promoting the war. There is the statement of the case and therein is the answer to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], who has just spoken and who is insisting that this business should be done through the Federal Reserve System.

The gentlemen who framed this bill had that very question in mind, and in this preamble, which has been stricken out of the House bill as being not altogether proper legislative form, they set forth their purpose which frankly and boldly was to enable a corporation, to be known as the "War Finance Corporation," through an appropriation to be made by the bill, an appropriation of $500,000,000, and through funds to be raised through the selling of bonds, to do what? To lend money on transactions coming up through Federal reserve banks, to lend money to private bankers, to lend money to banking corporations, and, further than that, to lend money to individuals or to corporations who are unable to obtain money through the regular banking channels if such individuals, corporations, and so forth, are conducting business contributory to the war. The gentleman from California may be right that the Federal Reserve System is capable of handling all this business. I had hoped that that was the situation and brought that question up. The answer of the Secretary of the Treasury and the answer of the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board is in the hearings.

These gentlemen have spoken upon that subject, and it is their opinion that this business, which is new war business, should be disassociated from the Federal Reserve Bank System.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Do the hearings disclose the number of industries that have encountered difficulty in financing their enterprises?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; they do not disclose those industries in number.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Were there any business enterprises appearing before the committee that showed the necessity for this legislation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certain hypothetical cases were stated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Were any business men or heads of enterprises before the committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There were no business men, except several Members of Congress who are business men, before the committee, but the committee was informed that the chairman had extended general invitations to the bankers and other people interested to come before the committee and be heard. There was no response, I will say to the gentleman, from any banker of any distinction. They seemed to prefer not to appear before the committee, and to that extent the committee was at a disadvantage, but the impression was that the banking interests of the country favored this measure.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did the business interests of this country request this measure?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Judging from certain statements made; yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. By business men?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. By the Secretary of the Treasury and the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Bank System, speaking for bankers and business men.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did their examination show that business concerns required capital that they could not get through regular banking channels?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Their testimony certainly did show that there was need for this legislation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Hypothetical or actual?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One case was mentioned in confidence; it has since been referred to in the public prints. It was stated to the committee that the railroads would need more assistance. If I have time I will go into that more fully. I shall narrate some of the instances in which assistance was desired, but, speaking broadly, I will say that it was contemplated that assistance should be rendered not only to railroads, not only to munition establishments, not only to public utilities generally, not only to concerns including water-power companies, but also to individual concerns and to farmers, if need be. The assistance proposed was to run down the line, according to the business and banking judgment of the gentleman who should be in control of the corporation. They were to take into account the war emergency need of these various interests and concerns that sought assistance.

Mr. SWITZER. The Secretary of the Treasury requested $4,000,000,000 for extension of credits, did he not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He did. Eight times the amount of the capital.

Mr. SWITZER. And your committee reduced that to $2,000,000,000?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It did.

Mr. SWITZER. Now, upon what facts before the committee did it take such action to reduce the $4,000,000,000 to $2,000,000,000?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because it was stated to the committee that perhaps the entire eight times $500,000,000, which was $4,000,000,000, plus $500,000,000 in the aggregate, might not be needed.

Mr. SWITZER. Did the Secretary of the Treasury say anything about assisting farmers?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I will come to that.

Mr. PLATT. I have read the hearings over and I was present at some of them here as well as in the Senate, and I do not recall seeing anything in them where the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody representing the Federal reserve bank said that the Federal Reserve System could not handle this business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I might as well refer to that now as at some other time, because the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] has left that matter in the minds of the gentlemen present. The Secretary of the Treasury said:

The Government's borrowings, particularly during the period immediately preceding and following each liberty loan, have tended to preempt the credit facilities of the banks and often to prevent them from giving needed and customary help to quasi-public and private enterprises. Many instances have been brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Federal Reserve Board where industrial plants, public utilities, power plants, railroads, and others found it difficult, if not impossible, to obtain the necessary advances to enable them to perform vital service in connection with the war, because essential credits ordinarily available to them are being absorbed by the Government itself.

Now, there is a fact that I hope to leave with you for a moment, that the Federal Government which is lending money to our allies, which is making vast expenditures on war account in this country, is draining the financial resources of the country, of the banks, of the trust companies, and of the savings funds, in order to place the liberty loan which is to keep the wheels going, and that it is about to place a third liberty loan, the drive beginning on April 6, when new demands, for an amount not yet stated, but estimated to be upwards of $3,000,000,000, will be required from the banks already having numerous Government bonds in their vaults. That drive will necessarily contract the power of many of the banking institutions to lend.

Mr. PLATT. That, of course, is true; but the reason why the Federal Reserve Bank System can not handle it is because the Federal reserve banks are not allowed to discount notes based on collateral security. Suppose they were allowed to do it, has anybody said they would not be able to handle the situation? I do not say that I am in favor of that, but nobody has said distinctly that they could not do it if allowed to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will quote the Secretary of the Treasury a little further on that:

The Federal reserve act does not provide for these and the War Finance Corporation is designed as a war emergency to fill this gap. The provisions of the Federal reserve act which permits Federal reserve banks to rediscount and purchase commercial paper and paper secured by the Government's obligations have had the effect of forcing the banks to discriminate against loans on ineligible paper—

Now, bear in mind that matter of discrimination.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose the law was changed so that they were not forced to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Wait a moment until I finish what the Secretary says:

Even where such loans are vitally necessary for war purposes in favor of loans on commercial paper; even where they represented activities or enterprises not related to the war and which might well be curtailed during the period of the war. It is believed that the proposed bill has been widely and conservatively conceived as a war measure to give relief from this condition during the war.

Mr. PLATT. The point I want to make is just this: The Federal reserve members, including Mr. Warburg and others who appeared before the committee, and the Secretary of the Treasury himself, gave this their indorsement as a separate war institution because they did not want the business to be thrown into the Federal reserve bank. But they did not say that the Federal reserve bank could not take care of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They intimated that it would be very dangerous to throw this business into the Federal reserve banks, and Mr. Warburg indicated that it would destroy the system.

Mr. PLATT. But it was shown that the banks in Europe did that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, that is worrying the gentleman—what the banks in Europe have done?

Mr. PLATT. I share Mr. Warburg's view on this point, but I do not think that anybody has said that the Federal reserve bank could not handle this business.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will in a moment. In committee I asked Mr. Warburg this question:

Mr. MOORE. The Federal reserve bank is undoubtedly a fixed institution, and some of us are inclined to think it is as close to a central bank as ever the United States Bank was.

Mr. WARBURG. None of this should ever go into the Federal reserve banks. Indeed, all that we provide now is that during the war, and as long as these obligations are outstanding, the Federal reserve banks may discount the paper security of these banks. We have not given the Federal reserve banks any larger powers than that. If this corporation wishes to go out of business, there will not be any other instrument that can do this business. I am very much opposed to having any of these powers go into the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. MOORE. You make that statement as a financier?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes. I want to be quite clear in regard to that proposition. The rediscounts, as proposed, I am in favor of. But the power to grant loans on bonds and stocks, and make direct loans to corporations in need, that I do not want the Federal reserve banks to enjoy.

Mr. MOORE. That would have an unfortunate effect upon the existing banking institutions throughout the country, would it not?

Mr. WARBURG. If it were done, or not done?

Mr. MOORE. If this corporation were to do a direct discount business with the public.

Mr. WARBURG. It would be more than a discount business, because it would be buying securities; it would be making permanent five-year loans. If we were to put that power into the Federal Reserve System we would destroy it.

In other words, if I understand this proposition at all, it is to give relief to the Federal reserve banks so that they may hold on to their present business and expand their credits.

Now, I want the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] and the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], who is going to oppose this bill, to bear that in mind when discussing this bill in their own time. My understanding is that in order to give the Federal reserve banks the power of expansion—I will not say inflation; that may come along in due course—it is proposed to organize a corporation that will create a larger circulating medium and afford relief to war industries the banks can not or will not accommodate.

Mr. SNYDER. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Has not the gentleman overlooked the fact that within the next few months or so we must pay $2,500,000,000 of taxes into the Government, and is it not fair to propose that this is to assist that operation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. It has a great deal to do with it. We are approaching, I will not say a money crisis, but a money stringency, as things are now going in connection with our war demands.

Mr. SNYDER. We are approaching a money crisis unless this bill or some other similar bill is passed whereby this vast amount of tax can be paid in on the basis of one or two or three or more payments in the year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a matter that the Committee on Ways and Means will no doubt take up in due course. The question of paying taxes in installments has been discussed, and there may be a great deal of merit in it. I do not want to be diverted to that question at this time, however. It is true that men in business, even those who are supposed to be making vast sums of money in the manufacture of munitions, are having difficulty in getting all the money they want for furthering war enterprises.

Mr. SNYDER. On Saturday I spoke with a banker in the city of New York, and was told by the vice president of a bank that he had a friend across the way who had a large business and had a million dollars to pay in taxes, and that he had been in there that morning endeavoring to raise the whole amount on a loan.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has cited one case. I will cite another, because of the speech made by my distinguished friend and colleague from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who had the floor on Saturday. The gentleman from Michigan stated his impression that the sole purpose of this bill was to lend money to the railroads. Mr. FORDNEY may not have stated it quite so strong, but the impression left here was that railroads mostly were to be favored by this legislation.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] cites a case wherein a business man has difficulty in securing money to pay taxes. I could fill the RECORD with cases of this sort, but I am going to call attention to the very important matter of the maturing obligations of the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad Co. For present purposes I do not care whether somebody unloaded on the company or not. There are plenty of utility companies in this country, perhaps, which have had bonds put out on the market and sold below par that might now be in position to derive some advantage from this bill. I am not excusing their faults, but if any such companies are doing war service I do not want any of them to go into the hands of receivers at this critical time. I do not care what the impression of the public is regarding the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. at this particular juncture of the war, I would prefer not to see it go into the hands of receivers. I would prefer that the banks that are supporting it now should be supported, because if one bank goes, another goes, and here in the midst of a war crisis we would have trouble on our hands approaching a financial panic if relief was not afforded.

The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. has been constantly referred to as one of those concerns that might be assisted by this new corporation. I do not know whether it will be or not, but it is interesting to note as we go on just how these things develop. There was a meeting in New York on Saturday last——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It could be assisted under the railroad bill just passed, could it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It could, and it could be assisted under this bill. This bill will assist railroad corporations as well as other corporations that are contributing toward the success and progress of this war. A meeting was held in New York City on Saturday and reported in the newspapers on Sunday. Among those who attended the conference, if the newspaper reports be true, were Howard Elliott, representing the New York, New Haven & Hartford; Thomas W. Lamont, representing J. P. Morgan & Co.; Robert Winsor, of Kidder, Peabody & Co.; and A. J. Sheldon, of Lee, Higginson & Co. Those gentlemen, you understand, are all distinguished bankers.

"It was ascertained after the meeting," the report goes, "that no plans were being made by any banking syndicate to take up the maturing New Haven notes." That was no small matter in the banking world. Now, in yesterday's newspapers appears another report. I quote the following newspaper dispatch from Washington:

WASHINGTON, March 16.

Means of meeting the New Haven Railroad's $43,000,000 one-year notes maturing April 15 was taken up to-day with John Skelton Williams, director of the railroad administration's division of finance, by Howard Elliott, of the New Haven, and a committee of directors. No conclusion was reached and the conference will be continued.

Director General McAdoo is anxious to have the New Haven meet the obligations on its own responsibility without specific Government aid, but also wishes to maintain the company's credit.

Here is a great railroad conferring with the greatest bankers of the world, and receiving no encouragement, according to this announcement. What is it? Is it extraordinary rates of interest? Is it lack of securities? What is it? After conferring with these gentlemen in New York the president of the railroad comes to Washington and meets the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the matter is there discussed. Now, I am not sure whether this bill is intended to meet a situation like that, but I assume it is, and I assume that if the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., or any other railroad company doing an essential war business, as this road does, and without which this country would be in great distress to promote the war, could qualify under this bill it would obtain assistance.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WINSLOW. If I am correct, the gentleman stated a little earlier in his remarks that the country was approaching a financial stringency, to put it mildly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. By that I meant to throw out no scare. I am not authorized to do that, and would not do it. I said that very soon there will be a new issue of liberty loan bonds, that necessarily will call in a great deal of money, and make those bankers who prefer liquid assets move about rapidly to get the necessary funds to do ordinary business, and especially war business.

Mr. WINSLOW. Accepting that as the gentleman has stated, in view of the great amount of liberty bonds now in the banks of the country on loans, and in view of the new issue about to be sold, would it not be to the advantage of the country if payment of this tax money, due next June, could be made in partial payments?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have just answered that question. I do not see how that can be done easily. There would have to be legislation on the part of Congress, and I see no indication on the part of the Ways and Means Committee to amend the revenue law for the present. My personal judgment is that it might be well to permit the payment, at least of the heavy taxes soon to be due, in installments, spreading them over a period of time, rather than have them all come together at one time.

Mr. WINSLOW. Now, to go a step further, and based on the gentleman's remark, would he feel that the fact that the Ways and Means Committee had not yet considered it and that it needed legislation to bring about such a result would be any considerable hindrance, in view of the way we take up legislation these days?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As one member of the Committee on Ways and Means I have no objection to taking it up. Bills have been presented to the House, and there is quite a propaganda now favoring the passage of a bill permitting the payment of taxes in installments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to myself 10 minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman state why when these bonds are issued by this great corporation they should not have the absolute O. K. and guaranty of the United States Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will tell the gentleman why they ought not to have it. This is a new and separate financial enterprise, in which the Government invests $500,000,000. The Government thus does its part in starting the enterprise. It should not be responsible for these corporation bonds any more than it should be responsible for the bonds of the Philippine Railroad. And the purchasers of the bonds, who get a higher rate of interest than is paid for liberty-loan bonds, should be so informed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is a Government enterprise, however.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not a Government enterprise except as the Government appropriates $500,000,000, which is all it should be called upon to lose, if it loses anything. I will say to the gentleman that in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the Government will not only not lose anything, but will actually make money through its investment in the War Finance Corporation. He so expressed himself to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One more question. The gentleman has mentioned a certain railroad likely to be in need of financial assistance by this corporation, and there will be other railroads. Why is not this great corporation likely in a short time to become the holding company for the railroads now in the hands of the United States and to stay that way?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not. This new corporation is to have a temporary existence, and I give notice that at the proper time I shall offer an amendment cutting down the life of it from 10 years to 8 years. Its bonds are to mature in five years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not that the blind part of this bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think so. If I get time, I will show just how far it is proposed to go in this matter.

Mr. WINSLOW. May I interrupt the gentleman for one question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WINSLOW. I want to ask if in the gentleman's judgment the sale of the next issue of liberty bonds would not be enhanced if the people of the country who have to pay these taxes next June felt that they could pay them in installments rather than in a lump sum?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would commend that suggestion to the Secretary of the Treasury. If he has the power to permit the payment of these taxes in installments it might be a good thing for him to do it; that is my individual judgment.

Mr. WINSLOW. And if he has not the power, would it not be a suitable subject for legislation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would be a suitable matter for legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think we could easily pass the legislation sufficiently early to avoid the necessity of paying all the taxes in a lump sum on the 15th of June?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That might be. I commend the suggestion to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says this corporation has the power to take care of the railroad notes. Does the gentleman think that the corporation has the power to take care of the railroad bonds that will soon mature?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; this, and the railroad-control bill.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Would it come under the terms of this bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Such relief could be granted. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that Congress might pass legislation providing for the installment payment of taxes without having the bill drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The fact that this bill has been so broadly amended is an indication that Congress is passing this legislation on its own account. I do not know of a single measure that has come before the Ways and Means Committee, since I have been a member of that committee, that has been so cut up and modified.

Mr. WALSH. It could be done by the passage of a joint resolution.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That might be. I commend to the gentleman the suggestion that he offer such a resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. I have a question I would like to ask the gentleman for information. I notice in reading the hearings that the remark was made several times that in Europe through the central banks they are doing just what it is proposed that this War Finance Corporation should do. I do not know what these central banks in Europe are. In England, as I understand, there is no central bank except the Bank of England, and the Bank of England does all of this kind of business, and so in France.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They do it there.

Mr. MORGAN. But if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I get the gentleman's point, I want to get along. I will answer the gentleman. In England they have a capital issues committee, and that committee practically controls the situation. This bill provides for such a committee except that this particular bill, as amended, takes away the compulsory power to issue licenses and makes licensing voluntary, as it really is now under the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Bank of England discount notes secured by collateral——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I refer the gentleman to the experts on foreign banking.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania was an expert.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not. If I was I would be better able to answer the gentleman's questions. The gentleman from Oklahoma is an expert on farm credits and if he examines it closely he may find a look-in in this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. It may come along, but I have read all the hearings.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman had asked the gentleman from Tennessee, Judge HULL, who is an expert on foreign banking, he would doubtless have received an answer. As I said, this business is done in England through what they call a capital issues committee, which restricts the issue of securities and practically dominates the capital situation as to essentials and nonessentials.

I desire now to quote what the Secretary of the Treasury said with regard to the loan of money to railroads. This colloquy is from the printed hearings:

Mr. MOORE. Railroads will not be covered by this bill?
Mr. MCADOO. Well, the licensing feature does not apply to them at all. But this corporation is designed to help them if necessary. I say to you gentlemen frankly that one reason why the appropriation in the railroad bill is only $500,000,000 is because I expect this corporation to help railroads as well. Of course, $500,000,000 is not going to take care of the needs of the railroads even during this coming year.
Mr. MOORE. That's important. I wanted to get at a possible misuse of the power conferred upon the proposed War Finance Corporation. It is only fair and right for a legislator to make such inquiry.
Mr. MCADOO. Certainly; I thing such inquiry is proper. It is my judgment that one effect of the existence of this corporation would be to make it possible for such concerns to get aid from the War Finance Corporation in case of necessity—that is, in an exceptional case. Such exceptional cases would probably not arise to a great extent as long as bankers know if they furnish credit to such concerns—they can rediscount the paper with the War Finance Corporation. Therefore I think the fears of some gentlemen are not well founded, unless they fear that the existence of the corporation will have the effect of cutting down excessive interest charges, and I think that very necessary.
Mr. MOORE. Electrical companies would come within the scope of the activities of the War Finance Corporation?
Mr. MCADOO. Oh, yes.
Mr. MOORE. And water-power companies?
Mr. MCADOO. Yes.
Mr. MOORE. And public-utility companies generally, including trolley lines?
Mr. MCADOO. Yes.
Mr. MOORE. They would all be considered contributory to the war?
Mr. MCADOO. I should say directly contributory.
Mr. MOORE. And they may properly apply to the War Finance Corporation for relief in case the banks do not help them in the usual way?
Mr. MCADOO. Yes. But my theory of this War Finance Corporation is, as this bill provides, that direct assistance would only be extended in exceptional cases. I think such applications would have to be accompanied by a showing that the applicants were not able to get credit through the ordinary channels in the usual way and upon the usual terms.
Mr. MOORE. Exactly. Munition plants would be included, quite naturally?
Mr. MCADOO. Yes.
Mr. MOORE. And those plants contributing parts for munitions of war, such as ordnance and things of that kind?
Mr. MCADOO. Precisely.
Mr. MOORE. Would those independent concerns that I referred to a little while ago be considered if they should present a good case?
Mr. MCADOO. Certainly.

Then the questions take up the farm-loan proposition and the possibility of the farmer obtaining assistance in addition to that already extended to him, and the Secretary admits that in exceptional cases he also must be considered as eligible. It is a long story and intensely interesting and requires careful handling.

Mr. DARROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. DARROW. I notice that my colleague has quoted from the Secretary of the Treasury frequently in his remarks here. Do I understand that he agrees with all that the Secretary has said about this corporation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I simply accept as truthful the statements made by so high an official as the Secretary of the Treasury. He tells us that the business interests of the country are in such shape in regard to their ability to obtain loans and transact war business as to make this War Finance Corporation expedient; that many of them can not obtain sufficient money from the banks to continue their war business in this crisis. That statement deserves our attention. I am legislatively affected by the Secretary's statement of fact that corporations and railroads needing money are unable to obtain it for war purposes. That statement comes from the Secretary of the Treasury, who ought to be informed, and it is backed up by the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the very institution that is supposed to be complaining. It has great weight with me at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to myself five minutes more. Answering generally these gentlemen who have put questions, and very properly so, I wish to say that I had very grave doubts as to the propriety of this bill. In committee I offered suggestions and joined with others in making suggestions calculated to perfect and modify its provisions. I think we have greatly improved it. We required in this bill what the original bill did not require, namely, that the appointments of these responsible heads who were to be put in charge of the War Finance Corporation should be made by the President and confirmed by the Senate. We provided that the Capital Issues Committee, which was originally to have compulsory power with regard to the issues of securities, should also be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. From my point of view that was exceedingly important, because it assured publicity so far as it could properly be had in this transaction. I did not want a wheel within a financial wheel here which would give to five men in the Federal Reserve Board the power to dominate all the industries of this country and to tie up all of its finances. I preferred that the names of these men should be emblazoned out yonder in the spot light, where we could see them and know who they were, and understand they were not working for their own ends, but were working for the Government of the United States or for this corporation which the United States is sponsoring. I preferred that that Capital Issues Committee of seven men—and originally it was proposed that it should be composed of but five, some of them to be members of the Federal Reserve Board—should be nominated by the President in the open, and that their names should come before the Senate, so that we could know who these men were who were to dispense favors on the one hand, if they dared to do it, or to crush industry on the other, if they dared to do it. I wanted to know whether this great corporation which could tie up the industries of the country, on the pretext of conserving capital for war purposes, if we conferred this power upon them, was to be appointed in the open or in secret, and I believe the bill now guards against the possibility of its being done in secret. I do not charge that there is anything which would be done in secret, but some great financiers of this country do not always agree with Congress, and they prefer not to make reports of all their transactions. In a matter so vital to the welfare of the Nation as this, it seems to me they should.

In closing, I wish to say that this bill is in much better form than it was when it came to the committee. It has been modified; it has been vastly improved; but even so, I still desired to know that a bill of this importance, fraught with such danger to the welfare of the Nation on the one hand, or capable of doing so much good on the other, was actually supported by the President of the United States. That seemed to me to be signally important.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know the gentleman is well posted upon this bill, and I would like to have him explain why it was thought necessary to take out of this corporation's capital the right to purchase Government bonds. We are loaning $500,000,000 to ourselves——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would say to the gentleman that I have taken more time than I am entitled to, and I know that we are going to get into a controversy if I undertake to answer his question. I can not do it in the time that is left and shall have to proceed.

I wanted to know if the President of the United States stood for this measure. The people of the United States have placed their confidence in the Executive. Congress has gone far out of its way to bestow power upon the President of the United States because of the people's confidence. We have voted him almost absolute direction of our affairs. We have created commission after commission, some of which may not be coming up to our expectations, though they seem to be coming up to his. But the people have confidence in him as the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and I wanted to know if the President of the United States stood for this measure, whether in view of all of the things said about it and against it he believed it to be a measure that ought to pass as a necessary measure of war. I wrote to him the following letter:

"MARCH 6, 1918.

"Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
"President United States,
"The White House.

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: So far as I have observed, no Democrat has stated with authority that you approve the war finance corporation bill as a war measure.

"I do not know whether you would care to make a statement to me upon this subject, but I am frank to say I would not want to vote for the transferrence of such tremendous powers over securities and the business affected by them unless I knew that such a recourse was, in the judgment of the President, essential for war purposes.

"If you feel justified in writing me upon this point, I will appreciate it. Or if this suggestion does not meet with your approval will you not authorize some one to make a positive declaration as to the war urgency of this bill?

"The Ways and Means Committee is now preparing to report the bill, but I have heard many Members of the House inquire as to the President's attitude thereon.

"Very truly, yours,

"J. HAMPTON MOORE."

To that letter promptly came the following reply:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, 7 March, 1918.

"MY DEAR MR. MOORE: I am very happy to answer the question contained in your letter of March 6.

"I am entirely in favor of the adoption of the war finance corporation bill. I deem it, in fact, a necessary war measure.

"Very sincerely, yours,

"WOODROW WILSON."

"Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
"House of Representatives."

So the President stands for the bill.

The question, then, that confronts me, as one Member of Congress, is this: The President of the United States, backing up the Secretary of the Treasury and the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, indicates his desire to have this bill passed. He regards this war-finance corporation as a necessary war measure. He makes this declaration in the midst of a war which, so far as the United States is concerned, has barely begun. We have spent vast sums of money, we have entered into large transactions the wisdom of which some of us may have questioned, but we have gone along with the President in all essentials thus far. After taking over the railroads, which was authorized by this Congress, after conferring these vast powers upon the President of the United States, we are confronted with this new war measure. The President tells us, in effect, that it is necessary to complete the great war work that we have intrusted to him. He tells us this new corporation is needed. We are told we must provide these additional resources for purposes of war. What are we to do? Shall we grant this request that comes from the administration itself, that comes from the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States, or shall we defeat it and risk setting the Nation back? It is a question of confidence in the President. Therefore I shall vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is not in the House. I looked in the Republican cloakroom for the purpose of inviting him to be present while I made a few remarks with reference to his speech of last Saturday. The gentleman from Ohio made the first partisan political speech made during this session of Congress during the consideration of a war measure. It is true that during the entire speech he waved the flag, but while he energetically waved the flag with one hand he skillfully wielded the stiletto with the other hand. Not content with criticizing the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, not content with attempting to discredit them in the eyes of the American people as autocrats seeking for vast autocratic powers at the expense of the people, he sought to reflect upon the patriotism and membership of this House on the Democratic side. Realizing it was unfair and improper, he endeavored to justify his conduct by asserting that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] had inserted in the RECORD an editorial by ex-Gov. Glynn charging that Republicans in this House have put politics above patriotism. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] challenged the statement. In reply to him the gentleman from Ohio said it was contained in that editorial. I have that editorial. I challenge any man to show a single sentence or a single word mentioning either the Republican membership of this House as a whole or an individual Member of it. Nowhere was it mentioned, nowhere could it be mentioned, for up to the time the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] made that speech no partisan political speech had been made during this session of Congress.

That editorial referred to WADSWORTH, to CHAMBERLAIN, to LODGE, and certainly they are not Members of this House. It made reference to Theodore Roosevelt, and Mr. Roosevelt is not a Member of this House. No charge was made there or anywhere else that a Republican Member of this House was endeavoring to put partisanship above patriotism. The gentleman from Ohio contrasted the conduct of Fitzgerald, of New York, and Adamson, of Georgia, in resigning, one to return to the practice of the law and the other to accept an appointment in the Government service, with that of LAGUARDIA, of New York, and with ROYAL JOHNSON, of South Dakota, who entered the military service. Who would have our good old friend, Judge Adamson, 64 years old, enter the National Army? Who would have Fitzgerald, with his wife and eight children, and at his age, enter the National Army? Does it reflect upon their patriotism that they have not enlisted in the military service? No man criticizes or could ever criticize the conduct of Gussie Gardner, of JOHNSON, or LAGUARDIA. I knew Gardner before I came to the House. I loved him. No man grieved more to learn of his death than I did. The gentleman from Ohio said he had "gone west," and I think Gussie Gardner would have preferred a thousand times to have "gone west" than to have stood on this floor and had his military service used as the basis for reflection upon Democratic Members of the House. [Applause.] LAGUARDIA, HEINTZ, JOHNSON, all deserve credit. In this hour a man can do only that which his conscience dictates it is his duty to do. They were impelled by patriotic motives, I know, and yet I dare say the gentleman from Ohio will never admit that they are more patriotic than he is, and he has not enlisted in the military service. If perchance duty led them to go into the service and retain their membership here, does the gentleman mean to say we should all follow their example? I respect their patriotism, but I do not agree with their judgment, for if this Congress is the important branch of this Government that the gentleman from Ohio would have us believe it is, what would happen if we all resigned, or rather did not resign, but entered the service and retained our membership here?

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not. I have only 15 minutes, and I want to say something further.

This reference to the Democratic Members who have resigned was a mere diversion from an attack aimed at the Secretary of the Treasury. How startling it was to the American people to learn that this bill as it was presented to the Committee on Ways and Means authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, an ambitious man, as the gentleman from Ohio calls him, to gather unto himself autocratic powers greater than any kaiser or war lord ever sought. That was the language he used. Then he assured us that he succeeded in having eliminated from the bill those features that constituted a menace to the Republic. He saved the Republic, which was about to be wrecked. Saved it how? By taking from the Secretary of the Treasury the power to name the directors of this War Finance Corporation and giving that power to the President of the United States. Did the gentleman believe that the President of the United States would appoint directors who would not work in harmony with the Secretary of the Treasury? What justification is there for the belief that either the President or Secretary of the Treasury would abuse the powers conferred in this bill? If we can give to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of War, acting for him, the power to send our boys over the top and into the trenches of the enemy, must we now hesitate to give to the President or to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to direct this War Finance Corporation, which is nothing but an emergency corporation, to exist only during the war? What power has Mr. McAdoo abused? What abuse of power has he been guilty of that justifies this criticism? Why, as Director of Railroads he has more power than is given him in this bill.

As the Secretary of the Treasury he has powers greater than are proposed in this bill. The Aldrich-Vreeland bill, which the Republican Party presented some years ago, proposed to give to the Secretary of the Treasury far greater powers than were ever contemplated in this bill. Is it fear of incompetency? No; for no man would say so. Six years ago it might have been said by his critics, but during these six years he has so demonstrated his ability that the financial and commercial world, that was then told by the prophets of evil in the Republican Party that he was incompetent, now realize and appreciate his incomparable executive ability. But the fear of the gentleman from Ohio is not that he will NOT make good. His fear is that he WILL make good. The gentleman from Ohio said that he saved the Republic by eliminating this feature that was a menace to our free institutions, and gave to the President of the United States the power to appoint the directors to be associated with Mr. McAdoo. Well, what does he say of the President? He says:

> I repeat that this incessant reaching out for legislative functions on the part of the Executive, this inordinate greed for autocratic power is a menace to the very foundations of our system of Government.

So the gentleman from Ohio transfers the power from the Secretary of the Treasury, whose ambition he thinks a menace to the foundations of the Government, to the President of the United States, who according to the gentleman from Ohio possesses a greed for autocratic powers. Was he sincere? I think not, and the same insincerity runs all through his speech. The gentleman says that "there are men in our party who could help to win if you gave them positions on the regular team instead of keeping them on the side lines." Is there any justification for that statement? Can a man go into the departments of the Government without finding there Republican after Republican appointed by this administration to aid in the prosecution of this war? Go down into the Council of National Defense and you could ring a bell and hold a Republican convention in an hour. Go to the Food Administration or the Fuel Administration and see the list of appointees there, and it will read like a list of delegates to a Republican convention. You know that no inquiry was made as to their political affiliations.

Has there been any complaint of being kept on the side lines by ex-President Taft? Has he not gone from one end of the country to the other, forming the public sentiment of the Nation, doing such work as to cause the American people to think more of him to-day than they ever did before? History will record that he loyally supported the Government in its hour of peril, and every Democrat as well as every Republican joins in paying tribute to his unselfish and patriotic service. [Applause.]

But that, my friends, is not the trouble. The trouble with the gentleman from Ohio is that our other ex-President, Mr. Roosevelt, was told by the people of America six years ago to stay on the side lines for a while. Two years ago he was told by the Republican Party to stay on the side lines for still another while. The gentleman from Ohio knows, as all men know, that Theodore Roosevelt would never play on any team unless you made him pitcher, catcher, infielder, and outfielder, and then let him umpire the game.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRYNES of South Carolina. I can not.

Mr. MEEKER. Are you not mighty glad he did not stay on the side lines?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. He has to stay on the side lines, so far as captaining this team is concerned. He wants to take charge of the team and oust the man who is captaining the team—Woodrow Wilson. But until the end of his term President Wilson is going to be captain of the team, and no set of men can remove him from that position. You never went to a baseball game in your life that there was not in the grand stand a man of the type of the gentleman from Ohio, who wanted to run the team and yelled to the captain to take the pitcher out of the box. That kind of man never goes to a fire that he does not want to discharge the chief of the fire department and run affairs himself. But the chief of the fire department at this time is Woodrow Wilson. The world is on fire. We must fight our enemy as though we were fighting fire. The people of America are in favor of our thus fighting, and they do not intend to let any set of men hobble-skirt or tie the hands of the chief of the fire department while this fire is on. [Applause.]

The gentleman denounced the Overman bill, and when he referred to it he talked like a United States Senator. The Republic was about to crumble if the President is authorized to reorganize the executive departments. The Constitution was to be set aside. In his opinion all power ought to be placed in the hands of a director of munitions and in a war council. But the President says he wants no director of munitions and he wants no war cabinet. The Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy calls for the passage of the Overman bill, and the Congress is going to pass it.

This is no time for politics, and the people are not going to stand for it. They understand and will follow the issue from now until the end of this war. A man who gets in the way, a man who seeks to play petty politics to promote his own personal political ambitions or the interests of a political party will find when he returns to his home that he is discredited in the eyes of his people and in the eyes of all Americans. We are going to uphold the hands of the President, not as the gentleman from Ohio did on Saturday when he declared the President was "like a Mikado of ancient Japan in his isolation from the common people," not by having the Secretary of the Treasury held up to the people as a seeker after autocratic powers, but we are going to uphold his hands by giving to him those legislative weapons which he believes essential for the successful conduct of this war. [Applause.]

In order to thus loyally support the President it is not necessary that a man be a blind hero worshiper, as the gentleman from Ohio would have us believe. The President does not ask nor does he expect that Congress shall blindly accept, without amendment, the bills submitted to it by the various departments with his approval, but he has the right to ask and to expect that his motives shall not be questioned. With open eyes and without indulging in hero worship I have been able to follow him in his conduct of our international affairs, and to-day we find that his followers are not confined to this country, but that the leaders of thought in all the allied nations acquiesce in his judgment and look to him for an expression of the thought and ideals of the liberty-loving people of the world. He has appealed not only to the intellectual but, with an accuracy almost uncanny, he has read the hearts and expressed the sentiment of the common people of the country. He claims no infallibility and asks no blind submission to his will, but he has demonstrated his unselfish devotion to his country and his unsurpassed capacity for leadership, and he has the right to ask and to expect that in this hour partisan politics shall be laid aside and that all Americans shall support him in bringing this war to a speedy and successful conclusion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], a member of the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] last Saturday made a speech on the bill that was so able, showed such a grasp of the whole situation, and made such a careful analysis of its provisions, that, in view of the fact that there were a very few Members in attendance when the speech was delivered, I want to commend it to the attention of every Member who was not present at the time. I say this partly because I am not able to agree with all the views expressed by the gentleman in that speech. In what little I could say in 10 minutes in reference to the bill, I shall confine my remarks solely and entirely to the measure itself.

As has been stated by every member of the committee who has discussed this bill, it is emergency legislation, pure and simple, and yet there seems to have been a disposition in some quarters to question the fact that an emergency has arisen which should make it necessary that legislation of this character should be passed. It is true that in most respects the financial sky at present is clear. We have had no bank failures and no rumors of bank failures. When I last investigated the number of business failures, they were fewer than usual. Money can still be obtained on the market by certain institutions. I noticed, for example, the other day that the Procter & Gamble Co. was able to obtain $25,000,000. So that at this particular time it would hardly be correct to say that a crisis in our financial affairs is upon us. But it is necessary at this time that we should look into the future and to consider what has already occurred which might be a sign of portending danger.

The first thing that we observe is that all through last year there was a steady fall in the price of bonds, accompanied also by nearly the same decline in the prices of stocks. The reason for this is perfectly plain. It is a result of what you might call either the universal rise in prices or inflation. The man that gets 6 per cent as the earnings of his dollar during the year finds that it buys for him in fact only what 4 per cent would have bought before the war, or even less. The result of this decline in prices is a great shrinkage in the assets of savings bank, insurance companies, and similar institutions. The aggregate amount is tremendous, running into the billions.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Do you mean all kinds of bonds? Do you include municipals in that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. They have all fallen in very nearly the same ratio. I am not able to go into the details at this time. Money rates are rising day by day. This large loan that I spoke of that was made to the Procter & Gamble Co. was made at a rate exceeding 7 per cent, whereas this company could probably have borrowed before the war at a rate less than 5 per cent. All bonds have shared in the decline. Government bonds and the bonds of the big cities have not lost so much as others, but their market quotations have fallen off heavily.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can the gentleman tell where Procter & Gamble got the $25,000,000?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have forgotten from whom it was obtained.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where was it procured?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It was procured in New York City.

A very serious situation prevails with reference to the railroads and the public utilities. It is perfectly obvious that any concern that finds its costs of operation mounting day after day and its income fixed by law must necessarily experience a stringency with reference to its financial affairs, and must also find difficulty in negotiating its securities. The enactment of the bill for railroad control will, I think, sufficiently provide for the railroads; but every public utility finds its needs greater and its borrowing power less.

I shall explain later on, will not have time now, why I think the railroads will be taken care of without the provisions of this bill, but I shall not discuss that now. I will only say that I hope that none of the capital or bonds provided in this bill will be used for that purpose.

There is another matter which we ought to notice at this time, which has its portent for the future, and that is the slow but steady shrinkage in the amount of deposits in the savings banks in several localities. This shrinkage in deposits and depreciation of securities of these banks constitutes a distinct menace to these banks which unfortunately is sure to be accentuated in the future. All these changes which have taken place have been caused by the large demands for money made by the Government. The enormous amounts which have been taken have been unprecedented in our history and in the history of the financial world. Our appropriations for this year will nearly equal the whole amount appropriated for England during the war, and additional demands are to be made. It therefore behooves us at this time to take account of the future, to observe closely what it has in store for us, and if we do so we must come to the inevitable conclusion that some legislation must be enacted to guard against the perils that threaten our financial system.

Now, what kind of legislation shall it be? I am not prepared to entirely approve this bill. I had thought that it would have been better if a subsidiary corporation had been formed to the Federal reserve bank, private in its nature, not so likely to be influenced by politics or controlled by personal preference. But it is obvious that no such plan would be successful unless it met with the approval of the administration and the assistance of the Treasury. So we must lay anything of the kind aside. What other plans are offered? Only one, so far as I know.

The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], in a very able argument which he presented this afternoon, advocated giving the reserve banks the power to loan on that class of security not known as liquid security; in other words, on long-time security, which he thought would remedy the difficulty and enable sufficient funds to be acquired. I am not satisfied that this ought to be done.

We have in the Federal Reserve System a tower of strength at this time. Its solidity is unquestioned. Its power to sustain the banks in all ordinary commercial transactions has never for a moment been doubted, and I believe we ought to keep it in that condition and not have it loaded down and its stability, if not impaired, at least made subject to question or doubt by empowering it to loan money upon a class of securities which must be handled by this institution which is provided for in this bill.

But obviously, gentlemen, whatever is to be done must be done soon. We can not stand here arguing at this time. We must not wait until the foundations of our financial system are shaken, until our savings banks and great financial corporations are tottering on the verge of ruin. It is a time for action. Important and great as these measures are, far-reaching as they are, we must to some extent take our chances on the issue. The administration says that it wants this kind of a measure; that it wants this bill passed. We have taken it in our committee, given it study and preparation and care, and have pruned here and trimmed there, modified here and restricted there, until we believe we have safeguarded both the Government and the public as far as is possible and retain the bill in its essential features. When once we set out upon this untried and uncharted sea no one can entirely predict what results will follow, but we have undertaken to lay the course as safe as we could and adopt this bill at all.

I can not in my limited time explain the changes in the bill from its original form, but I want to speak of some. Gentlemen have asked why we have limited the amount involved in the bill, for example. We did that because we could plainly see that it would take considerable time, at least, to absorb $2,000,000,000, and if the necessity comes upon us further on requiring a greater amount, then it can be provided. We had hoped by some of its provisions to eliminate anything of a political nature or political bias in its action. We had hoped that its benefits, such as they are, would be fairly distributed among all portions of the community. It is perfectly obvious that the success or failure of this plan must depend on the good faith and ability of those who have it in charge, and of necessity we are compelled, in the first instance, to commit any plan of this kind to the guidance of the administration, and it must ask for its support. The administration must work out any plan that is successful, and I am willing to a large degree to subordinate my own views to those of the Government.

Now, I would like to have taken up another topic, but as I have only a minute left I can not do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will not the gentleman explain, as he promised, his views to the effect that the railroads can be handled in some other way than by this legislation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will undertake to do that under the five-minute rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I believe some gentlemen have another view.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. There is one other phase, for which I would like to have three minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it not true that this measure, like all other measures that we pass, if honestly and carefully administered, will result in good, and if wrongly administered it will result in the opposite?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is correct. It is especially true of this measure, which, if wrongly administered will wreck the country, if properly managed protect it from disaster.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. After all, it is very largely a question of administration?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. It is very largely a question of administration.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], by inference, somewhat criticized the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], which were also still more severely criticized by the gentleman [Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina] who just preceded me. I shall not review the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, as I think they were purely political. But there was an intimation contained in the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, however kindly it was made, that did not seem to me to be completely justified. The intimation was that in discussing the concentration of power which is created by this bill, the gentleman from Ohio was not really discussing the terms of the bill. If it was intended, I think it was not justified.

One of the most serious questions in this bill arises over the power that it confers to make or break anyone who is engaged in business anywhere in this broad land. For that reason I would have been much more favorably disposed to some plan that came out of and through the Federal Reserve System, controlled and operated in the first instance by those who manage that system and who represent every portion of the country and are supposed to represent every kind of business.

Now, it is a fact that one of the great dangers in this country has been this concentration of power and control over credits. In the discussion in the British Parliament with reference to the British Trade Corporation, which was intended to have a purpose somewhat similar to this one, although much smaller and less far-reaching, a member of Parliament, Mr. Lough, quoted President Wilson as follows:

> The great monopoly in this country is the monopoly of big credits. The financial resources of the country are not at the command of those who do not submit to the direction and domination of a small group of capitalists. When a small group of men approach Congress in order to induce the committee to concur in certain legislation nobody knows the ramifications of the interests which those men represent. I merely say that there has come about an extraordinary and very sinister concentration in the control of business in the country.

Those are the words of President Wilson. Now, this measure fairly administered will tend to disrupt and break down that control by these sinister forces, or, if the law was wrongly or improperly administered, it might set up a control that was a thousand times more dangerous.

Mr. GLASS. May I suggest to the gentleman that that control no longer exists and has not existed since the Federal reserve act went into effect, and the words of the President which the gentleman has quoted were uttered before the Federal reserve act was passed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that his remarks only apply to commercial credits and not to funding operations. The statement has been made on this floor and has been uncontradicted that a large public utility corporation was obliged to pay in New York City 13½ per cent interest in order to obtain the necessary funds to carry on its business. That statement shows first that it could not get the money at the banks. We find, first, that the banks told it that they did not have the money to loan; second, that somebody else, presumably the gentlemen who were controlling the banks, took the money either out of the banks or obtained it in some other place, and then told them they might have it at 13½ per cent. I am inclined to think that that control over the funds of this country still exist, and I believe, as Mr. Warburg stated in the hearing, that one great object of this bill is to control the rates of interest, to make them more equitable, more fair, and more reasonable. It ought to destroy profiteering in interest rates, which is as dangerous to the safety of the country as any other kind of profiteering at this time.

Mr. GLASS. I suggest to the gentleman that the incident he has mentioned was in the nature of an investment in a refunding scheme and not in current commerce. Current commerce is absolutely unrestricted since the passage of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is quite true, but this bill is intended to apply to refunding operations which are so necessary at this time, and provide for loans which the reserve banks could not make—in fact, are not permitted to make.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. The American people are largely responsible for the present condition which prompts the suggestion for such legislation as is now proposed by this measure.

As individuals we have been thriftless in our public duties and exactions. We have been content to go along from time to to time in a false sense of security, and have been wasteful, with no regard for the future. The future has now arrived, and we are about to see the folly of the past.

Thrift is now a national necessity, and the quicker the American people realize that the quicker will the war be won. Our production must be increased, but we are taxing increased production and asking people to economize, but no tax is levied on over consumption. The great losses occasioned by this war, such as loss of property, productive power, and disorganization of business can only be met by thrift and conservation of our remaining resources, and by more efficient methods in all lines and vocations, including operation of the Government and our war machine.

I have seen no proof as yet that the paper to be issued by this proposed War Finance Corporation and made eligible for rediscount with the Federal reserve banks would be a different kind of paper than would be created by broadening the basis of eligible paper to include outstanding corporate securities, except the fact the United States will subscribe $500,000,000 to the stock of the corporation.

I contend that the main source of relief lies solely in the Federal reserve banks, who will continue to carry the burden of relief supposed to be afforded by this new corporation.

The operation of this new system will be to clog the Federal Reserve System. The enacting of this legislation means that the Federal Reserve System has failed to stand the very test that its advocates said it was intended to serve and would serve, and the men who were the most responsible for the enacting of the Federal reserve law, which law bears their names, Owen-Glass, and who are still chairmen of the Banking and Currency Committees of the Senate and House, are both fearful of this legislation and the resulting effect it will have on the Federal Reserve System.

I do not hesitate to say that if this legislation had been considered by the Banking and Currency Committees of the two Houses of Congress a very different bill would have been reported than the bill we are now considering.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman intend during the course of his remarks to show how the Banking and Currency Committee would have improved it?

Mr. McFADDEN. I may do that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman has any improvement to suggest upon the action taken, I wish he would offer it.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think the gentleman will be satisfied when I have finished.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope he does not mean that the Banking and Currency Committee would not have done anything.

Mr. McFADDEN. I did not intend to cast any reflection on the Ways and Means Committee. I raised the question of the proper reference of this bill when it was referred to another committee, both on the floor of the House and in the Banking and Currency Committee, but without avail. This bill as drawn still has in it unheard-of powers, and places those powers in the hands of five men, a majority of whom I feel satisfied are now overburdened with other governmental responsibilities and duties, but will be named to serve upon this board to further concentrate the power and control in the hands of a few. Oh, your Pujo investigation of the Money Trust! Where are you now?

THE SHERMAN LAW AND PUBLIC-SERVICE COMMISSIONS.

A great deal of our present trouble is due to the enforcement during the past few years of the Sherman law, the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and their narrow vision of the needs of the railroads "looking to the future," and the failure to make the railroads make the necessary economies, and give them an increase of rates which would have permitted the railroads to meet the demands upon them occasioned by the growth of our industries and the country generally. The creation and almost similar action of the public-service commissions in the various States, to say nothing as regards price-fixing by the Government of 90 per cent of their requirements for extensions and improvements, has affected seriously the public utilities of the country. The railroads, with a capitalization of nearly $17,000,000,000, and the public utilities, with over $10,000,000,000 capitalization, form a most vital part of our wealth at this time, and should now be a source of great strength, but are both appealing for aid from our already overburdened Government, due almost entirely to the reasons I have just given. Now, in addition to this, the savings banks, State banks, and trust companies are appealing, fearing withdrawals because of the fact that the United States is monopolizing the money market in the sale of liberty bonds to bear an increasing rate of interest. My answer to these institutions is, come into the Federal Reserve System and help this system carry this burden which is upon them, but they say we do not like the management of the Federal Reserve System. We do not like the Comptroller of the Currency and his attitude toward the member banks. I say to such it is your patriotic duty to join this system, and if the officers of the system fail to function properly public opinion will be so strong against them that they will be removed. If all the banks were under this Federal Reserve System now, no legislation of this kind would be here.

THE CAPITAL ISSUES COMMITTEE.

The power to be invested in the capital issues committee are very great and might, if manipulated by designing men, be the means of utter disaster and ruin to many business concerns in this country who are capable of rendering aid to the Government by diverting from the manufacture of nonessentials to help win the war and thus save the Government a vast amount of capital outlay by converting many of these factories and utilizing their complete existing organizations. We, of course, must assume that this committee will function honestly and capably. Their greatest work will be first to cut down unnecessary public expenditures, including that of anything but for temporary use in the war, and then all other State and municipal town and township improvements not immediately necessary to win the war and then pass upon all capital issues and renewals. This is a power that must not be passed over lightly because it has strangulation powers to any business or interest that is not in favor with this board.

ADDITIONAL POWERS.

I would not pass over the authority given to the board to buy and sell any class of securities, including stocks and bonds or bonds of the United States. I would have you consider the vast and unheard of power that this right conveys on five men, and the fact that they will have a fund at their disposal of two and a half billion dollars and four and a half billion dollars under the Senate bill. Think what this power means coupled with the powers conveyed to the capital issues committee, and the power given under the railroad bill, including that of placing embargoes on concerns that can not be reached by the other two powers. You have in these bills, this bill and the railroad-control bill, complete power and domination over all finance and industry in this country, and you can count the men in control on the fingers of one hand.

OUR FAVORABLE TRADE BALANCE.

We have a trade balance now of over $3,000,000,000 in our favor, and we are loaning our allies over $7,000,000,000 more. Is this going to be paid back to us in money at the close of the war? No; it is not. These countries then will have no money to spare, but will pay us back in goods that they will sell us so cheap that we can not afford to resist. This opens a very interesting subject, upon which I will not enter at this time.

FALLACY OF INFLATION.

The argument is made that it will be necessary to inflate because of the vast needs of the country at this time. I would ask you what becomes of the money that the United States is using? It is not leaving the country nor is our credit being used to any great extent abroad. Why, it all goes right back into our financial system to aid business or industry to function. And as our wealth is shot away the Government fills the gap in our balance sheet by bonds which the future must pay or carry the resultant burden. A surplus of credit always causes extravagance and lessens the purchasing power of the dollar, evidenced by an increase in the cost of living.

I quote from John Stuart Mill as proof of this, "and no better authority exists":

> Other things being the same, an increase of the money in circulation raises prices; a diminution lowers them. If more money is thrown into circulation than the quantity which can circulate at a value conformable to its cost of production, the value of money, so long as the excess lasts, will remain below the standard of cost of production and general prices will be sustained above the natural rate.
> But we have now found that there are other things, such as bank notes, bills of exchange, and checks, which circulate as money and performs all the functions of it, and the question arises, Do these various substitutes operate on prices in the same manner as money itself?

I apprehend that bank notes, bills, or checks as such do not act on prices at all. What does act on prices is credit, in whatever shape given, and whether it gives rise to any transferable instruments capable of passing into circulation or not.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF THE BRITISH TREASURY.

I want to call your attention also to the report made last December of the select committee of the British Treasury as to the cause of high prices in England, which has just recently been made public in this country:

The chief causes are (par. 17, p. 4):

"The expansion of credits during the war.

"The demand for commodities exceeding the supply and the inadequacy of Government action to control prices.

"Increase of wages and consequent increase of the cost of production.

"Increase in the rates of profit.

"Unfavorable rates of exchange in some of the countries from which supplies are imported."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is not quoting now, is he? He is drawing an inference from the quotation.

Mr. McFADDEN. No; I am still quoting.

On the first of these factors the committee has this to say (par. 18, p. 4):

"The Government, through the Bank of England and the joint-stock banks, has created large new credits to enable its contractors to expand their production. It has also borrowed from the Bank of England large sums on ways and means advances, and in so far as these advances have not been offset by equivalent borrowings from the market on the part of the banks, which has always been the case, this operation has been a pure creation of credit. * * * These measures may not in any way affect the soundness and stability of our financial institutions, but they have had the result of creating new purchasing power on a large scale. The new purchasing power, distributed over the greater part of the nation, in so far as it spends itself in investment in Government loans, does not take the form of additional demands for goods and does not send up prices. But in so far as the new purchasing power comes into the market for commodities and takes the form of additional demands for goods it does send up prices."

So when the committee makes its recommendations as to what may be done to keep the cost of living from going higher and higher what is the very first of its proposals? It is this:

"1. Whatever measures are possible should be taken by the Government to avoid the creation of new credits in financing the war."

For "new credits" read for America "credit and currency expansion," and the conclusions would perfectly fit the situation here.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman state the recommendations of the committee?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have not them here with me.

Mr. FESS. The first and foremost recommendation was that credits should be contracted instead of expanded.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is correct in that. That was the main recommendation of that committee. Their report made special mention of the fact that in England early in the war credits were permitted to become inflated, which now was becoming a serious menace—and the committee urged in the strongest terms that a contraction should be had at once—as such expansion was a very serious matter and should be stopped. We should certainly profit by their experience.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman wishes the House to infer that something similar to that would have happened here under the tremendous issues of this corporation?

Mr. McFADDEN. That is the idea; yes.

PREMATURE REGULATION DETRIMENTAL.

I believe that the administration has by its premature attempt to regulate prices and take over practically the entire management of our industries, finances, food, coal, and other necessities impaired the greatest source of our strength—individual initiative—and that our greatest ability to produce and increase production necessary to meet the demands upon industry by war laid in the increase of these facilities in the hands of the men patriotically inspired to greater effort who have made the United States industrially what it is to-day.

INFLATION AND EXPANSION.

Any person who starts out to study finance with the belief that a piece of paper is money must do his share of rambling until he gets that false theory out of his mind. Money must possess a value of and in itself. The same thing is true respecting the quantitative money theorist. It is not the quantity of money in the country which causes an advance of prices, but the use to which money is placed—that is the telling factor. Prices of commodities are governed by the inexorable law of supply and demand. The great philosophers of credit have always contended that gold and credit have precisely the same influence on values, and MacLeod also says that "it has been shown by authentic statistics that in modern times gold only forms about 1 per cent of the circulating medium of currency; and to suppose that a variation to the small extent of a fraction of 1 per cent in the amount of the circulating medium, or measure of value, could produce the effect so popularly attributed to it is wholly beyond reason." The German credit system, as I shall proceed to show, is based on the quantitative theory of money. One of the best illustrations combating this theory I gave before the Ways and Means Committee the other day on this bill, and I ask your indulgence while I repeat it:

A good illustration combating the quantitative theory of money could be taken from this country in 1914, at the outbreak of the war. At that time the cotton spindles of Germany, Belgium, and northern France were in the control of the German Army, the allies controlling the seas and establishing an embargo which prevented the importation into Germany of our raw cotton. Consequently we found the cotton farmers here ruined, as cotton was selling below the cost of production. The amount of money and credit in this country was abundant at that time. It was a question of a large cotton crop—16,000,000 bales—which could not be utilized during that year on account of the spindles in the territory controlled by the German Army being rendered idle, and as that commodity could not be placed in a commercial state without the use of those spindles, the supply was so much greater than the demand the price fell below the cost of production.

At the present time we find cotton selling four or five hundred per cent above the 1914 price, due to decreased production and increased demand for its use in the manufacture of munitions of war. Profiting by their experience in 1914, the cotton planters began to diversify their crops, and now they can not procure the labor to produce the yield of 1914.

In the parlance of finance there are two words which pretty accurately characterize the contrast between the German and British systems of credit. I refer to the words "inflation" and "expansion," the former applying to the German system and the latter to the British system.

I want to define the meaning of these words. "Inflation" is the act of advancing the price of an article already created without doing anything to increase its productive power. Credit or gold used to purchase a permanent investment produces inflation. In a speech before this body on January 4 last I made this plain by calling your attention to the inflation in the land values in the West from 1900 to 1910. The land values of Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana increased during that decade from $3,458,504,310 to $7,209,582,325, or 108 per cent, whereas the land values of the district I represent in this body, a strictly agricultural district, decreased during the same time from $26,228,240 to $22,909,425, or 12 per cent. But the census reports give the yield of those lands for 1909, which for those three States aggregated $891,146,580, or 12 per cent of their 1910 values, as against an aggregate yield of $8,786,903 for the four counties of my district, which was 38 per cent of the 1910 values.

The correct standard of arriving at the worth of a permanent investment is its net income-producing ability, for under that standard we can ascertain the amount of labor required to become its owner and possessor. So by deducting 50 per cent of the gross yield of those lands we find that the farm lands of those three Western States are nearly a 17-year purchase, whereas those of my district are a 5-year purchase. The important question is, Why such a disparity between two sections of the same country? To my mind the answer is easy. The inflation in the land values of those Western States is due to the activity of the "blue-sky" operators, or real estate agents, and the easy facilities afforded by the banks of that section for mortgage loans. That is the combination which caused the inflation in the lands of those States, and the lack of such a condition in my district is due to the absence of such forces therein.

Every real estate agent is an inflationist. Every investment banker is an inflationist. Every German banker is an inflationist, for their principal business is dealing in permanent investments. No industry of Germany can obtain capital without going to one of the five "great banks" of Berlin. Some of those banks have representation on as many as 250 of the great industrial enterprises of Germany. The British banks have nothing to do with the promotion of industries or selling of investment securities, but confine their activities to the sale of "productive" credit, as distinguished from "consumptive" or speculative credit. "Productive" credit is a self-liquidating asset, and the bank which confines its activities to the exclusive sale of such credit becomes an important factor in increasing the wealth of the country, whereas the bank which sells "consumptive" or speculative credit not only produces inflation but will cause the whole credit system of his country to collapse. To illustrate the meaning of "productive" credit I will take the case of a farmer who has a quantity of corn and roughage but no cattle to feed it to, and that is the only way he can economically convert those farm products into a commercial state, for the people of the world could not consume the 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn produced by us last year. Now, he goes to a bank and buys credit with which to pay for those cattle or "stockers." It will require about four or five months' time for those "stockers" to be placed in a finished state for the market, so he obtains the credit for that length of time.

That is termed a self-liquidating credit transaction, because the farmer must sell the cattle which consumed his products to liquidate that transaction, for if he keeps them after they are finished they will eat their heads off and consume the farmer's profit in the transaction. Let us observe the different ways in which that farmer has been benefited by that credit transaction. In the first place he converted those farm products into fertilizer, thus enabling him to enrich his lands, and experts claim that only 20 per cent of the fertilizer value of such products are lost by feeding them to stock. In the second place he has converted raw materials into finished and salable articles of commerce, commerce which will bring gold from any hiding place, for all beef-eating countries must have it to sustain themselves.

When those cattle are finished that farmer sells them to the packer, who in turn goes to his bank and buys its credit and pays the farmer. Now, that is also a "productive" credit transaction, as the people of that farming community can not consume all that beef. The packer in turn sells it to the retail dealer or butcher and that is also a "productive" credit transaction, and it continues to be a "productive" credit transaction until finally a person comes along and buys a piece of that beef to eat, then it becomes a "consumptive" transaction. Where "consumptive" credit is sold, as is the case in this country, people will overconsume and waste, and every economist knows that we are the most wasteful people in the world, and it is due to the fact that too many of our banks sell "consumptive" credit.

Bear with me while I give an illustration of speculative credit. Suppose that the farmer, instead of buying cattle to eat his corn, should buy land, even improved farm land. If it be located in one of those three Western States it will require something like 17 years for it to liquidate itself, and 5 years if it be located in my district, according to the census statistics which I have given you. But those are not liquid transactions, for that is too long a time for any sound bank to lock up its borrowed capital, besides the bank which becomes a party to such a transaction is guilty of fostering an act of inflation, as I have shown you. So that farmer when pay day arrives must either sell that farm or some other security to raise the money with which to pay off that bank debt. And it is the use of the borrowed capital of a bank, its deposits, which causes the whole credit system to break down. In proof of that I cite to you the testimony of Mr. George M. Reynolds—one of the foremost bankers of this country—before the Senate committee when the Federal reserve bill was under consideration. He said:

The man who borrows money on stock-exchange collaterals in New York, and who wants to realize on them quickly, must depend on the ability of the borrower to reborrow that money immediately elsewhere or upon the sale of the same. Now, if the condition is so bad that the banks in the city of New York are unable to extend accommodations the result is that there is a very violent break in the values of securities and we are in the midst of a panic.

As Mr. Reynolds said, that was just what happened in 1907 when our credit system broke down, and there is no safer banker in this country than he, and I quite agree with the conclusion of his, just quoted. If Mr. Paul M. Warburg, deputy governor of the Federal Reserve Board, is not the author of this bill presented to Congress by the Treasury Department he has been put forward to furnish the testimony to support it. I must therefore ask your indulgence while I quote from the testimony before the Senate Finance Committee. I give the answers and questions:

Senator LODGE. Could you take these bonds to the Federal reserve banks as security and have currency issued on them?

Mr. WARBURG. A bank could. A bank having made a loan on it, it could. The Finance Corporation could not.

Senator GORE. I wish you would describe how that could be done.

Mr. WARBURG. How that could be done?

Senator GORE. Yes; what the process would be.

Mr. WARBURG. Well, let us take the public-utility corporation again, that has received these bonds. They might go to the City Bank and say, "I need $250,000. Here is my 90-day note secured by these bonds." The City Bank would indorse this $250,000 90-day paper to the Federal reserve bank and the Federal reserve bank would take it; it might put it up with the Federal reserve agent as collateral for notes, and it might not. In the latter case the note issue would not increase in the least through the transaction. Again, the City Bank might draw the equivalent by check and may not take out any currency at all.

Senator GORE. It could only be used by the Federal reserve banks as collateral?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

Senator SMOOT. Let me cite a case to you which I think is going to happen after the organization of this corporation with a capital of $500,000,000. There is authorized an issue not to exceed eight times the capital stock of that corporation, which is $4,000,000,000. Then you issue a billion dollars of notes and obligations to this corporation. Now, they go onto the market, and we will say that half of them go into the hands of the investing public and the other half goes into the banks.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

Senator SMOOT. Now, when the banks take $500,000,000 of those bonds they no doubt will go to the Federal reserve bank and get the currency on that $500,000,000.

Mr. WARBURG. They might not get currency. They might want credit.

Senator SMOOT. Suppose they get it?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator SMOOT. Suppose they do get it. Then, when issued, there is that much inflation of the currency.

Mr. WARBURG. Expansion.

Senator JONES. Mr. Warburg, a while ago you used a term "expansion," and, if I understood Senator SMOOT, he rather thought it was a distinction without a difference; and I wanted to ask you if there is not a vast and substantial difference between expansion and inflation? In other words, is all expansion properly designated as inflation?

Mr. WARBURG. When expansion becomes extreme and unhealthy we term it inflation. I should say that, as far as the world's general banking and credit situation is concerned and the price level of things, we are on an inflated basis. So far as our currency situation is concerned, we are far from inflated. It is about the most conservative the world has ever seen.

Senator LODGE. It is not yet inflated?

Mr. WARBURG. Not yet. That is the point. The Federal reserve banks have still a gold reserve of 65 per cent of notes and deposits, which is more than the Bank of England had in its palmiest days.

Before attempting to reply to Mr. Warburg's distinction between inflation and expansion, I wish to call attention to another statement made by him at the hearings before the Senate committee. I again quote the questions and answers:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Warburg, I notice one or two cases in which a rather vigorous statement was made on the part of certain national banks, and I believe the National City Bank of New York, against the section which authorizes the Secretary, through the corporation, to issue notes.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not agree with that statement at all. I think it is utterly unwarranted. The writer of it appears to indicate that he considers it the better way to go back to the other method of putting out Aldrich-Vreeland notes rather than securities. Now, this war corporation will issue securities, not notes. That expression "notes" ought to come out.

Senator LODGE. "Notes" should come out entirely?

Mr. WARBURG. It ought to come out entirely. It ought to be "short-term bonds." They must be at least one year long. As far as these bonds go to the public, they are not at all going to tend to what you would call inflation, because they would not go into the hands of member banks or the reserve banks, and no notes therefore issued against them by the Federal reserve banks. Only when the investment market is filled and when the banks are full, then the banks may come to the Federal reserve banks for relief; and then, along with their commercial paper, they may rediscount some 15-day or 90-day paper, which would be secured by these short-time bonds of the corporation to the extent and at the rates at which Federal reserve banks may be prepared to discount that paper. Now, to say that this is going to create inflation is true only to that extent as every issue of Government bonds create in itself inflation, because if the Government, instead of the corporation, would itself issue these long and short time bonds the effect would be just the same as that produced by the issue of these short-time bonds. Now liberty loan bonds have no circulating privilege. No more have these short-term bonds. They can only be used as collateral for member banks' notes or paper, which may be rediscounted when the banks get into a position where they have to take recourse to the Federal reserve banks.

I might discuss this question until the close of this session and I could not possibly produce evidence more convincing than that of Mr. Warburg himself before the Senate committee which proves that he is an inflationist of the highest type. He tells the committee that the "notes" should come out. "It ought to come out entirely," he says. "It ought to be short-time bonds," he continues. If that testimony is worth anything, it proves that he believes that name counts for everything and the nature of the credit instrument counts for nothing.

Inflation does not result from the issuance of bank notes or any other kind of paper, but the use to which it is placed. It would be just as silly to contend that a person dies of poison because the prescription from which he obtained poison from a drug store was written with red ink instead of black ink. The prescription is only one of the evidences that the person died of poison, but it is not the best evidence; the best evidence in that case would result from a chemical analysis of the contents of the stomach. And so it is with the paper of this proposed corporation. It matters not what you call that paper, "short-time notes," "short-time bonds," currency, or whatnot, because if they, or either of them, be used to purchase a permanent investment or the production of waste they will produce inflation, whereas if they be used for the production of essential articles of commerce or agriculture the effect would be just the opposite. And the effect would be just the same whether the war material, the production of which is to be the essential business of this corporation, be paid for with the "short-time bonds" of this corporation or gold realized by the Government from the sale of its long-time bonds, but if the Government pays for that war material in the latter way and such long-time bonds are not made eligible for rediscount at the banks, that would be the end of the inflation through that credit instrument. But if you clothe the credit paper of this corporation with a special privilege, as is proposed, and to which it is not entitled, then you create an endless chain for many other acts of inflation which will encourage extravagance and waste, and thereby defeat the very purposes of the bill—that is, the use of capital and credit for essential purposes only.

Let me show you just how this corporation will become the instrumentality of the worst sort of inflation, if the corporation is to enjoy the special privilege of issuing two or four billions of credit paper. In the first place the corporations would pay the munitions factories or other industries in that paper. Now, the banks of the reserve and financial centers of the country will virtually be forced to carry a large line of that paper and they can get it only from the munition factories or industries necessary to war. So the banks of these centers will exchange some of their gilt-edged long-time investments, which are far superior intrinsically to the paper of this corporation, but which do not enjoy such special privileges as will the paper of this corporation. Take the National City Bank of New York for example. And I take it simply because it is the largest in the country and is located in the financial center of the Western Hemisphere. Its management would be foolish not to buy a large line of the credit paper of this war finance corporation, a line running into the tens of millions. The National City Bank is the exchange agent for thousands of banks scattered all over the country, State banks and trust companies as well as members of the Federal Reserve System. Every bank in the country must carry a balance with some New York City bank so as to be able to sell exchange in that great financial center, and the New York City bank which can furnish the greatest accommodations to the banks all over the country would naturally get established the largest line of exchange balances.

What will be the result of that? Naturally it would ease up the credit at the banks all over the country, and whenever credit is easy at the banks the public will overconsume and contract extravagant habits which they would not contract if they had to pay the gold for them, especially so when the banks were telling them money was tight, and those people would know that they should hold on to that gold, and thereby be in a position to aid the Government in financing the war. And this would be the result whether one dollar of currency was ever issued by the Federal reserve banks against the credit paper of the proposed corporation, for the National City Bank could use that paper to maintain its large legal reserve at the Federal reserve bank and with its reserve intact it could accommodate with loans its correspondents throughout the country, which use it as their exchange agent in that financial center. Mr. Warburg said in the Senate Finance Committee hearing, in reply to a question propounded by Senator SMOOT, which I have quoted, and I now repeat his reply: "They," meaning the banks which collected the paper of the war finance corporation and presented it to the Federal reserve banks for rediscount, "might not get currency. They might want credit." Very few of the banks would get currency. They would prefer credit at the reserve banks, and with such credit they could accommodate their customers in the gratification of their extravagant desires.

That is the way the inflation will occur, and that is the way the expected purposes of the bill will be defeated. For the man who uses $6,000 of bank credit for the purchase of an automobile to give his family a vacation will have $6,000 less to invest in liberty bonds. The only way we can win this war is to economize and invest every dollar of our savings in Government bonds. This country must start a publicity campaign against extravagance of every sort. Make the patches on trousers badges of honor. That is the way the British are financing this war.

TRADE CONDITIONS IN ENGLAND.

I want to call your attention to an article appearing in one of our leading journals of recent date by the owner of the largest department store in London, England, in which he says that business is good in London, but the war has revolutionized it; that it is no longer stylish for people, however wealthy, to dress elegantly. We must do the same thing and adopt the same style. The Government should spend several millions yearly for advertising, for it must be borne in mind that it is the retail merchant who supports the daily and weekly press, and it is unreasonable that those papers should go to work and revolutionize the customs of the people when by so doing they would be fighting some of their best customers—the retail merchants. The British banks are aiding in that campaign of economy. It should be borne well in mind that the British and French banks have learned by sad experience the curse of selling "consumptive" credit. They learned that lesson generations ago in times of peace, a lesson we have never learned, and a very bad practice which has cost us much. The facilities for speculation and "consumptive" credit are too easy. Remember that the bank deposits "guaranteed cash-surrender values" of policies of our life insurance companies and similar cash-surrender values of our building and loan associations aggregate the stupendous sum of about $32,000,000,000, as compared with only about $3,000,000,000 for the same institutions of England and Wales. Furthermore, there are but 29 banks in England and Wales—banks with large capital and numerous branches and able and experienced managers in control—whereas we have some 30,000 banks with small capital and controlled by men who have not learned the science of credit and the danger of selling "consumptive" credit.

As proof of this fact, I desire to call your attention to the fact that at the present time 70 per cent of the capital of the banks is invested in long-time securities of the public-service corporations in the United States, and in addition to this the banks are carrying at the present time short-time notes of these same companies to the extent of $300,000,000, secured by the deposit of bonds of this same class at a margin, I suppose, of about 75 to 80 cents on the dollar.

A PARADOX.

Give me your attention while I state a paradox; and the reason I ask your undivided attention is that this paradox is the crux of the whole proposition. Listen! This paradox proves that a war machine controlled by an autocrat may be made so effective that it thwarts the operation of all other laws, and that includes the law of finance and credit. Brute force ruthlessly exercised always has and always will surpass moral suasion, supported by reason, in the immediate accomplishment of its purpose. All that saves Germany from financial ruin is her war machine, and none know that better than the great financial thinkers of Germany. But woe unto German credit when the German people begin to exercise some authority. Germany has violated the teachings of all the philosophers of credit and finance, and such violation includes the creation of the identical corporation proposed to be created by this bill, while our great democratic ally, Great Britain, has observed those teachings, yet the price of many of the essentials of life are as low in Germany as they are in Great Britain, according to the most reliable reports we have from those two countries. That is a paradox easily explained when conditions are understood in both countries.

GERMANY AND SLAVERY.

Another situation might be used to illustrate this situation—the condition of the black in the South before the War; and I make this illustration not for any inviduous purpose or any spirit of sectionalism. Housed in hovels, fed on rough, simple food, clothed in shoddy and denim, worked from sunup to sundown, and the products of their labor sold and utilized by an all-powerful owner for the particular benefit of the owner. Generally speaking, the only regard for the black was to keep him fit for his toil and to see that he was commercially profitable. Considering the investment and the cost of operation, there was utilization of man power to the highest efficiency in so far as conditions prevailing at that time would permit.

It is true that the German people to-day are the slaves of the German war lord, and that they will be made to sacrifice practically all that life holds dear, in order that the will of the Government may be carried out. For a time it will prevail, for a time it will be an apparent success, but in the end they must reap absolute disaster and ruin.

Germany, with her financial system violating all the laws of finance, does not crack because of the strength of her Government, which is now dominated by her war machine. But woe to Germany when the day of reckoning comes. How does Germany's war machine prevent her from cracking under the strain? First, she has taken into the State all the material wealth of the people and given a receipt for the same—a mere scrap of paper—redeemable after the war, and you know how Germany regards scraps of paper. Second, she has mobilized every man, woman, and child above the age of 14 or 15 years into the service of the State for war—the State is everything and the individual is nothing. After having mobilized all the population for war, the strong arm of the war machine is thrust out, and the word goes forth not for any purpose whatsoever shall you work or consume except for the purposes of war, and that you may be fit for war. I, the war god, will feed you like animals, will house, warm, and clothe you like animals, and you shall work to the utmost of your strength for the glory of the Government and the god of war. That is the reason why Germany does not crack; that is the power that permits Germany for a time to violate all economic laws, all credit laws, all laws of money and finance, and for a time escapes the reaping of the whirlwind.

Germany, you will notice, has kept down the prices of the essentials of life in two ways: First, by putting every living creature to work as hard as they could stand it, and that is especially true respecting her prisoners of war, in the working of whom she has surpassed any acts of savagery known to history. In the second place, she has accomplished this by conservation, by enforcing her bread and fat card system, and from reliable reports there can be no question but that card system has been effective. Why should not it be effective, with her system of spies, whose barbarity is a disgrace to civilization? Money is worthless in a country where you can not buy what you want and what your heart craves. There is no obstacle in Germany on the use of credit for production, but for consumption it is "verboten"—forbidden. It is worthy of mention here that Germany has a rural-credit system through which the poorest farmer in that country may obtain funds at low rates of interest, but every mark of it must be used for production. That was the cardinal principle of the system when founded 56 years ago, and that principle has been religiously observed ever since. It is the soundest thing in the whole German credit system, and without it the German Army never could have been sustained as long as it has been. There is still another method of conservation adopted by the German war machine since the war began, and it is the most inhuman method ever adopted by a civilized people. That is her system of murdering the old and very young by starvation—those who consume and can not help the war machine at this time. The last statement, while illustrative of my proposition showing how monetary laws have been arrested in Germany through her effective and brutal war machine, is too grave a charge to be made against a supposed civilized people without some proof to sustain it. I have read many accounts in the press of such practices in Germany, but my attention was specially attracted to it by an article which appeared in the Washington Post of last Sunday, which was written by Ignatius Kinast, who, the Post says, is "a German socialist who has just returned to Zurich after six months' travel throughout Germany."

I wish you would bear with me while I read an excerpt from that article. The writer says:

"In the district of Munchen during the period of 1917 the death rate between the ages of 55 to 75 was 21 per 1,000. I was authoritatively informed by a Bavarian official that this was nearly 9 per 1,000 more than the peace-time average death rate during the past 10 years, allotting to Munchen district a population of 1,000,000 souls; this death rate means that during the year of 1917 9,000 more people died between the ages of 55 and 75 than did in the years before the war. Judging from this rate and assuming that Germany has a population of 80,000,000 souls, it must be concluded that 720,000 more people between the ages of 55 and 75 died in the year 1917 than died during the years before the war. It made my heart sad, and I tried to refute it. But these were not my own speculations. These were the findings of a well-known Bavarian scientific investigator, and the conclusions were the result of anxious searchings after the truth. Some time later, when I broached this painful subject to a high health official, I became struck with surprise when that dignitary smiled reassuringly and informed me that the authorities were well aware of the fact. 'Then, you admit, Excellency, that we are in a process of extermination?' I inquired agitatedly. Once more he smiled serenely and assured me that there was no cause for alarm. And this was the way he reasoned. Admitting that the 720,000 abnormal death rate is correct, it proves that every day the German power is increasing. Men between the ages of 55 and 75 do not create food or any other commodities. If it is true that during the year of 1917, 720,000 more people died than in the year of 1913 or 1914, it is an incontrovertible proof that in 1918 the food reserve of the Empire will be that much more. He went on to prove to me by the 'gramme' that in 1918 the food ration of the German people would be so much increased. The more people upward from 55 and below 10 years of age died the more invincible would become the fatherland. I had to admit that his heathenish and cynical reasonings were too true. If the life and happiness of a nation must be judged from its power of resistance during a blockade, then he was right. The extermination of the nonproductive ages would leave the remaining population unimpeded in the unhampered conduct of destructive warfare. Nevertheless these are the reasonings of a desperate and defeated race. Germany is defeated, but can not be persuaded to acknowledge it."

GERMAN AND BRITISH SYSTEM CONTRASTED.

I must not comment on that terrible arraignment of the German rulers by a German writer, though I believe every word of it, for I must stick to my proposition of contrasting the differences between Germany and Great Britain in financing the war. As I have already said, Great Britain in financing the war has pursued the only effective policy which a democratic country can carry out, namely, by refusing to issue credit instruments which may be used for consumption and inaugurating a campaign for the people to economize in all essentials and save every penny and invest them in long-time Government securities. Let me call your attention to some of the important items in the German Reichsbank statements of July 23, 1914, and December 31, 1917. During those periods the circulating notes of that bank increased from $472,725,000 to $2,866,935,000, or more than 500 per cent. Its deposits during the same period increased from $236,000,000 to $2,012,600,000, or more than 754 per cent, and the notes of the Darlehnskassen—the German War Finance Corporation—held by it increased from nothing to $326,125,000, while the gold increased only from $339,225,000 to $601,645,000, or less than 100 per cent.

Contrast those statements of the German Reichsbank with the statement of the Bank of England from July 22, 1914, to January 16, 1918. During those periods the Bank of England's circulating notes increased from $146,585,000 to $226,625,000, or less than 55 per cent; its deposits increased from $279,600,000 to $815,025,000, or less than 200 per cent. The British Government did not create a Darlehnskassen or German War Finance Corporation, and consequently the Bank of England holds no such paper. During that period the gold in the Bank of England increased from $200,815,000 to $293,840,000, or 46 per cent.

Observe what a small gold reserve the Bank of England holds. That institution is the reserve agent for all the British banks, but those banks do not sell "consumptive" and speculative credit as do the German and United States banks. She could come here any day and get enough gold to increase her reserve money by 100 per cent if she needed it. John D. Rockefeller owns more wealth than the Bank of England; but does anyone think for a moment that he carries a gold reserve of $293,000,000? No; for the simple reason that he has no demand obligations to meet. It is expensive to carry idle gold, and that is why it does not carry it. But it has short-time bills of exchange representing "productive" credit, transactions which will always bring the gold when needed. Mr. George M. Reynolds at the Senate hearings on the Federal reserve bill said that the average maturity of the Bank of England paper was from 7 to 8 days, and that of the Bank of France 14 days, and yet Mr. Warburg would have us believe that the five-year "short-time bonds" of the American Darlehnskassen should be made eligible for rediscounts at the Federal reserve banks.

Are we the only people who can not learn from experience? I direct attention to the war-savings stamps experience. The Secretary of the Treasury has issued an appeal through the press for the people not to sell these stamps, for the simple reason they are producing inflation. Many people not accustomed to the saving habit denied themselves for a few days some luxuries in order to get one of the liberty-bond buttons, and afterwards sold the bonds or stamps to some merchant. Few merchants are capitalists, so they in turn sold them to the banks or procured loans on them as collateral. A man who denies himself one meal and acts the glutton at the next is not going to win the war. It is only by persistent effort by all in economizing foodstuffs and denying themselves the luxuries of life and investing their savings in Government securities that will win the war. I want to call your attention to the experience of the banks of Paris, France, during the Revolution of 1848, when every bank in that city, except the Bank of France, failed. And their failure was due to no other cause than that they were practicing the German system of finance. That is, they were loaded down with investment securities. Like the German banks, those French banks were financing the railroad industry. Commerce was at a standstill, and the distress was so great, due to those bank failures, that the French Parliament created a bank charter and the French Government supplied all the capital, and that new bank enabled the commercial and industrial enterprises to resume business. Suppose the French Parliament had organized a German Darlehnskassen, as is proposed by this bill, and had the Bank of France rediscount its paper, as Mr. Warburg says the Federal reserve banks are going to do, then the Bank of France would have failed also. You can not make a sheep out of a goat by a mere declaration of Congress, and if you do you will find your congressionally created sheep walking the fences and eating tin cans. And so it is with the paper of the proposed American Darlehnskassen. That paper represents consumption and should never go into the credit system, and the only way it can be made eligible for rediscounts at the Federal reserve banks is for Congress to make it so by a solemn declaration to that effect, and I am one who refuses to stultify myself, because I know it will mean ruin to the country.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD STATEMENT.

Since the officials of the Federal Reserve Board appeared before the committees holding hearings on this bill they have completely reversed themselves and condemned a transaction which was not near so bad as that which they ask us now to enact into law. Last November a banking syndicate disposed of $25,000,000 American Tobacco Co. 90-day 6 per cent acceptances, renewable up to two years. And that is the transaction I refer to and which the board has condemned so severely in a lengthy statement given to the press last week. Let me quote some of those criticisms which sustain my argument in every particular. They say:

Ninety-day notes made under a definite renewal agreement at a fixed rate is a camouflage for the convenience of the banker to enable him to finance himself by using the 90-day form as a mask to conceal what is in effect an ineligible note. When a credit is required for two years it should be regarded as an unsound basis for commercial borrowings on 90-day paper.

The board's statement continues thus:

Without a guaranty for renewals it would be dangerous for the borrower. With such a guaranty it would be an unsound banking credit. A demand for one or two year money, except for special contracts, indicates a need for greater working capital, which ought to be obtained by increase of capital or by sale of obligations in the investment market.

I seek no stronger argument than advanced by the board to support the whole trend of my own argument against authorizing the proposed corporation. Let us contrast that tobacco transaction and the business which this corporation is to do. There is no sort of question but that the tobacco transaction involved a real productive transaction. The only question was the time involved. The tobacco company doubtless believed it was a favorable time to buy raw tobacco and it could have raised the necessary money by selling stocks or bonds. The lowest point its common stock touched last year was $168.50 per share and the highest $220. But those in control of the corporation did not wish to sell some of that stock, as the market for stocks was depressed, and they would have to pay too high a rate for money, so it induced the banking syndicate to "camouflage" the public by floating its "short-time notes" in the credit stream, and that is precisely what the advocates of this bill propose to do, "camouflage" the public, just as the German Government has been doing all through the war, until they have now reached the breaking point, for I do not believe it possible for the German credit system to hold up another year, notwithstanding the effectiveness of their war machine.

Instead of having our own Government go to the capital market and sell its long-time bonds, the advocates of this American "Darlehnskassen" propose to issue its "short-time bonds" in payment of war materials and give them a special privilege to "camouflage" the banks and general public into the belief that they are not what they are.

But listen, while I quote further from the board's criticism of that tobacco transaction. They say:

It may be argued that there is at present no investment market, and that therefore these renewal transactions are necessary. But does the abrogation of the investment market afford a reason for the destruction of the commercial-paper market also? Some plan must and will be developed to restore to a certain extent, at least, the security market. But even if this restoration can not be effected, should we not look upon credit as a commodity of which only a limited supply is available? If we have approached the limit, would it not be wise to conserve credit and apply it only in those directions where its use will most benefit the country? In the case of the tobacco company, if it had not secured the full credit it sought it would have bought less tobacco and might have advanced its selling price. What if it had reduced its inventories and the consumption of tobacco? Would not this have been just what is at present required?

HEARINGS BEFORE THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

I ask those of you who read the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on this bill to bear witness to the fact that that is precisely the same argument I advanced against this corporation issuing any sort of credit instruments. But I wish to repeat that there is absolutely no comparison between the paper which the board was criticizing and that paper which the proposed "Darlehnskassen" will create, for the former represented production, while the latter will represent waste. The board in the last-quoted paragraph of its long criticism states the very gist of my argument, namely, that when you make credit cheap or easy you will cause overconsumption. This American "Darlehnskassen" paper will make credit easy at the banks, and that will allow them to accommodate their customers in the gratification of their luxurious desires. If that criticism could be published in every paper in this country it would do more good than any statement issued by the Federal Reserve Board during the past year. It would teach both the banks and the public to conserve credit, and that would mean that we would have less waste and more money with which to aid the Government in winning the war, and thus preserve our civilization.

THE SUGGESTED REMEDY.

I say, let the United States make such loans as are absolutely necessary to win this war direct to the public utilities, railroads, and industry—supervised by the best brains that this country affords, and thus instill into the public mind an air of confidence instead of suspicion. This confidence when thus acquired by the people will respond in a patriotic manner in the payment of an equitable amount of taxes and subscribe for bonds of the United States on long time, bearing a proper rate of interest. Stop the profiteering and the 10 per cent plus contracts. Convince the public that the billions are being used wisely, honestly, and efficiently to win the war and the best people on the face of this earth, the American people, will respond in the granting of all the credit that is necessary to win this war, if it takes the last dollar that America possesses.

ANSWER TO THE HOLDEN ARGUMENT.

In conclusion, I desire to observe the ingenious argument advanced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] on this floor on Saturday in advocacy of this bill. He starts out by quoting from Sir Edward Holden, who, for years, has been the most pronounced and persistent advocate of the German credit system among the London bankers, but he has made no headway either with the London bankers or the British Parliament. The sum and substance of the gentleman's argument may be found in Sir Edward Holden's report of this year to his board of directors of the Midland Bank.

Like Mr. Warburg, Sir Edward Holden and every other advocate of the German system, the gentleman from Tennessee compares the strongest point of our system with the supposedly weakest point of the British system, namely, the gold reserves. But none of them ever make mention in such comparisons with the weak points of our system or the strong points of the British system, and everyone will agree that any comparison which does not include the whole is fallacious and misleading.

Let me quote from the gentleman's speech. He said:

The credit-lending and note-issuing power of the Federal reserve banks is still more than two billions.

He arrives at that conclusion by taking as a basis our legal reserve arbitrarily fixed by Congress in creating the Federal Reserve System. That legal reserve is pure guesswork and grossly misleading, as no two economists have ever been able to agree as to the amount of gold required under a credit system which violates well-recognized scientific law. But Congress may next week reduce the reserve requirements of the Federal Reserve System by 50 per cent, and then the gentleman would contend that we were much stronger than we were the week before. Germany has done that ever since the war began, but she did it only to have the people believe she was sound, when in fact she was unsound.

If we refuse to profit by the experience of such countries as Great Britain and France, we should turn to the experience of one of our neighbors. Conant, in his "Banking in Mexico" written for the Monetary Commission, says that the Monte de Piedad, the largest bank of Mexico, had a specie reserve of more than 50 per cent a week before its failure, but the other 50 per cent of its borrowed capital was covered with permanent investments on which it could not realize.

You may call the proposed "Darlehnskassen" the war-finance corporation or any other name you choose, but if you give it the power to issue credit instruments and clothe such instruments with a special privilege, which similar instruments do not possess, you will thereby increase the facilities for inflation, and if our credit system does not break down during the war we will be years in getting to a position where we can push out for foreign commerce after peace is declared. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this measure as a war measure, as I have supported every measure in the seven years I have been in this House, to prepare this Nation for such a crisis as we now find ourselves to be in. I shall support it for the same reason that I have voted for every other war measure that has been considered regularly by the proper committees and recommended as important for the prosecution of the war since its declaration. I shall support it as I have supported every proposition, having an opportunity to deliver myself upon, for the protection of American life and rights on land and sea under all circumstances [applause]; and when both were not being or could not be protected I have voted to protect one.

This measure comes before us with the indorsement of the Ways and Means Committee. It comes at a time when a somewhat similar measure has passed the other House. Whatever argument may be submitted, it will not be upon the bases of urging support of the bill generally, because the membership of the House generally expects to vote for this measure.

But I do desire to present a few facts which appeal strongly to me why this bill in its present condition should pass and why the changes appearing in the bill showing difference from the first draft handed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and introduced by him on the 4th of February, should be supported and retained. Every safeguard that we have agreed upon, every brace that we can possibly bring ought to be maintained in this bill to make it strong, if strong it can be made.

This bill comes as a mighty corporation bill. It is, as I view it in its large sense, the organization of a central banking corporation. I have been at times a critic, although I supported it, of the National Reserve Bank System, because I thought, organized as it was, it was liable to fall short of the expectations of its enthusiastic supporters. I voted for it and called attention at different times on the floor of the House to its apparent nonworking in times of peace. We hoped that when the crisis came to this Nation it would be given an opportunity to do that which its advocates insisted it could do, if the opportunity was ever presented.

Prior to our entering into the war the Reserve Bank System as a factor in our national finances was almost negligible. About the 1st of March, 1917, before the declaration of war, the total earning assets of the 12 reserve banks were only $209,000,000. Now, after war has been running nearly a year the total earning assets of the Federal Reserve System are only $1,097,000,000. I hoped that when this measure was first considered it would take such form in the House that the reserve system which had become the law of the land would be given an opportunity to perform the functions which its supporters believed it would perform and which, with some doubt, I thought it might perform, that it should have the opportunity. It was with great regret that I found the bill has not taken the form of expansion of the functions of the Reserve Bank System.

But the bill is here with present purpose and form. My principal proposition is this, that what we have here is of such a colossal nature and stupendous in its proportions that it is impossible to give it all of the safeguards necessary both in the law granting power and in its administration.

I here present a copy of the bill as handed to Chairman KITCHIN.

A bill (H. R. 9499) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of affording financial assistance, either directly or indirectly, to persons, firms, corporations, and associations whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, in cases where such persons, firms, corporations, or associations shall be unable to procure funds on reasonable or practicable terms from the general public, or through the regular banking channels, and for the purpose of regulating and controlling the sale and offering for sale or subscription of securities hereafter issued, and for other purposes in aid of the prosecution of the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, together with four additional persons (who shall be the directors first appointed as hereinafter provided), are hereby created a body corporate and politic in deed and in law by the name, style, and title of the "War Finance Corporation" (herein called the corporation), and shall have succession for a period of 10 years: Provided, That in no event shall the corporation exercise any of the powers conferred by this act, except such as are incidental to the successful liquidation of its assets and the successful winding up of its affairs after six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. The capital stock of the corporation shall be $500,000,000, all of which shall be subscribed by the United States of America, and such subscription shall, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be subject to call upon the vote of three-fifths of the board of directors of the corporation at such time or times as may be deemed advisable; and there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose of making payment upon such subscription when and as called. Receipts for payments by the United States of America for, or on account of, such stock shall be issued by the corporation to the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be evidence of stock ownership.

SEC. 3. The management of the corporation shall be vested in a board of directors, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall be chairman of the board, and four other persons, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States. And director or directors so appointed may be removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, and vacancies however arising may be filled by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President. Whenever a vacancy shall occur among the directors so appointed, the person appointed director to fill any such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term of the member whose place he is selected to fill. Three members of the board of directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

SEC. 4. The principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in any city or cities of the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 5. That the four directors of the corporation appointed as hereinbefore provided shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation (except such part of their time, if any, as shall be devoted to other governmental business) and shall receive annual salaries, payable monthly, the amount of which shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States, not, however, exceeding the annual salary of the principal officer of an executive department of the United States. Any director receiving from the United States any salary or compensation for services shall not receive as salary from the corporation any amount which, together with any salary or compensation received from the United States, would make the total amount paid to him by the United States and by the corporation exceed the amount fixed as the annual salary of a director of the corporation, as hereinbefore provided. Of the four directors appointed, as hereinbefore provided, the Secretary of the Treasury shall designate two to serve for two years, and two for four years; and thereafter each director so appointed shall serve for a term of four years. No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation or member of any firm of bankers; and, before entering upon his duties, each director and officer shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement, and shall also take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. But nothing contained in this act or in the Federal reserve act shall be construed to prevent the appointment of a member of the Federal Reserve Board or of any other governmental administrative body or of a director of a Federal reserve bank as a director of the corporation.

SEC. 6. The corporation shall be empowered and authorized: (a) To adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to purchase or lease and hold or dispose of such real estate as may be necessary for the prosecution of its business; to sue and be sued; complain and defend in any court of law or equity, including courts of the United States; to appoint, by its board of directors, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are not otherwise provided for in this act, to define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, and prescribing the powers and duties of its officers and agents.

(b) To make advances upon such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances (1) to any bank, bankers, or trust company which has made and which has outstanding any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and evidenced by a note or notes; or (2) to any bank, banker, or trust company which has rendered financial assistance, directly or indirectly, to any such person, firm, corporation, or association by the purchase of its bonds or other obligations: Provided, That advances so made by the corporation on the basis of any such loan or loans shall not exceed 75 per cent of the face value thereof: And provided, That any advances so made by the corporation in cases where such financial assistance shall have been rendered by the purchase of such bonds or other obligations shall not exceed 75 per cent of the market value of such bonds or other obligations at the time of such advance, as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation: And provided further, That all such advances shall be made upon the promissory note or notes of such bank, banker, or trust company, secured by the notes, bonds, or other obligations, which are the basis of any such advance by the corporation, together with all the securities, if any, which such bank, banker, or trust company may hold as collateral for such notes, bonds, or other obligations. The corporation shall, however, have power to make advances (a) up to 100 per cent of the face value of any such loan or loans made by any such bank, banker, or trust company to any such person, firm, corporation, or association; or (b) up to 100 per cent of the market value at the time of such advances (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation) of such bonds or other obligations by the purchase of which financial assistance shall have been rendered to such person, firm, corporation, or association, provided every such advance shall be secured in the manner described in the preceding part of this paragraph, and in addition thereto by collateral security, to be furnished by the bank, banker, or trust company, of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, of a market value at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation) equal to at least 25 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation. The corporation shall retain power to require additional collateral security at any time.

(c) To make advances from time to time, upon such terms not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding 90 days, to any savings bank or other banking institution which receives savings deposits, on the promissory note or notes of the borrowing institution, whenever the corporation shall deem such advances to be necessary or contributary to the prosecution of the war or important to the public interest: Provided, That such note or notes shall be secured by the pledge of securities of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the market value of which, at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation) shall be equal in amount to at least 125 per cent of the amount of such advance: And provided further, That the rate of interest charged on any such advance shall not be less than 1 per cent in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the time of such advance at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrowing institution is located. The corporation shall retain power to require additional collateral security at any time.

(d) In exceptional cases, to make advances directly to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms and upon the security of such bonds, notes, or other obligations, and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The corporation shall retain power to require additional collateral security at any time.

(e) To subscribe for, acquire, and own, buy, sell, and deal in bonds and obligations of the United States to such extent as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine.

(f) To issue and have outstanding at any one time its notes or obligations in an amount aggregating not more than eight times its paid-in capital, such notes or obligations to mature not less than one year nor more than five years from the respective dates of issue, and to bear such rate or rates of interest, and may be redeemable before maturity at the option of the corporation, as may be determined by the board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or obligations shall have a first and paramount floating charge on all the assets of the corporation, and the corporation shall not at any time mortgage or pledge any of its assets. Such notes or obligations may be issued at par in payment of any advances authorized by this act, or, for any of the purposes of this act, may be offered for sale publicly or to any individual, firm, association, or corporation, at such price or prices as the board of directors may determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or obligations may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulation privilege, and Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to rediscount and purchase paper and make advances secured by such notes or obligations in the same manner and to the same extent, and at the same rates, or at such higher rates as the Federal Reserve Board may approve, as they may purchase or rediscount paper or make advances secured by such bonds or notes of the United States, under authority of the Federal reserve act. Any Federal reserve bank acquiring by purchase or rediscount such paper secured by the notes or obligations of the corporation may, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, use such paper so acquired for any purpose for which it is authorized to use paper secured by such bonds or notes of the United States: Provided, however, That whenever Federal reserve notes are issued against the security of such paper the Federal Reserve Board may make a special interest charge on such notes, which, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, need not be applicable to other Federal reserve notes which may from time to time be issued and outstanding. All provisions of law, not inconsistent herewith, in respect to the purchase or rediscount by any Federal reserve bank of paper secured by such bonds or notes of the United States, and in respect to Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper, shall extend, in so far as applicable, to the purchase or rediscount of paper secured by the notes or obligations of the corporation and to the Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper.

(g) To exercise by its board of directors and its duly authorized officers or agents, all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this act, and such incidental powers as shall be necessary or proper to carry out the purposes of this act: Provided, That the powers specifically enumerated herein shall be deemed additional to, and not in limitation of, any implied powers granted by this act: And provided further, That it shall not exercise any of those powers or perform any business except such as is incidental and necessarily preliminary to its organization until it has been authorized by the President of the United States to commence business under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. For the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, the corporation may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided. No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell, or offer for sale or for subscription, any issue, or any part of any issue, of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, nor, when required by such rules and regulations, except as permitted by licenses granted by the corporation. The corporation shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offer for sale, or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes. Shares of stock of any corporation or association without nominal or par value shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be of the par value of $100 each. Any securities which upon the date of the approval of this act are in the possession or control of, or have been hypothecated by, the corporation, association, or obligor issuing the same, shall not be deemed to have been issued prior to the date of the approval of this act, within the meaning hereof. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit, or to require any license from the corporation in respect of, any borrowing by any person, firm, corporation, or association in the ordinary course of business as distinguished from borrowing for capital purposes. This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States. This section shall not take effect until rules and regulations shall have been prescribed by the corporation, as hereinbefore provided, and may continue in effect until the expiration of six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be determined by a proclamation of the President of the United States. Nothing done or omitted by the corporation hereunder shall be construed as carrying the approval of the corporation or of the United States of the legality, validity, worth, or security of any securities.

SEC. 8. That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act or of any license, order, rule, or regulation issued hereunder, or whoever shall willfully violate, neglect, or refuse to comply with any such license, order, rule, or regulation issued hereunder, shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $5,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for more than four years, or both; and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation or association, or member of any firm, who shall knowingly participate in any such violation, neglect, or refusal shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment or both.

SEC. 9. That all net earnings of the corporation not required for its operations shall be accumulated as a reserve fund until such time as the corporation liquidates under the terms of this act. Such reserve fund shall, upon direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be invested in bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, or upon like direction may be deposited in member banks of the Federal Reserve System, or may upon like direction be deposited in any of the Federal reserve banks. The Federal reserve banks are hereby authorized to act as depositaries for and as fiscal agents of the corporation in the general performance of the powers conferred by this act. Beginning six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be fixed by a proclamation of the President of the United States, the directors of the corporation shall proceed to liquidate its assets and to wind up its affairs. Any balance remaining after the payment of all its debts shall be paid to and become the property of the United States, and thereupon the corporation shall be dissolved.

SEC. 10. That any and all notes and obligations issued by the corporation shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations. The interest on an amount of such notes and obligations the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000 owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation shall be exempt from the taxes provided for in subdivision (b) of this clause. The corporation, including its franchise and the capital and reserve or surplus thereof, and the income derived therefrom, shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except that any real property of the corporation shall be subject to State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed.

SEC. 11. That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall, for any reason, be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, or in case any court of competent jurisdiction shall adjudge to be invalid any provisions hereof in respect of any class or classes of securities, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder of this act, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, part, or subject matter of this act directly involved in the controversy in which judgment shall have been rendered.

SEC. 12. That the term securities, as used in this act, includes stocks, bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, and other obligations.

SEC. 13. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

I herewith present that portion of the committee's report showing radical departure from the department's draft:

ESSENTIAL DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THIS BILL AND THE WAR FINANCE CORPORATION BILL AS ORIGINALLY INTRODUCED.

The essential differences between this bill (H. R. 10608) and the bill H. R. 9499 are as follows:

1. This bill provides that not more than three directors of the corporatiton shall be members of the same political party. The original bill did not contain such a provision.

2. This bill specifies that no director or officer of the corporation shall participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interests or the interest of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is interested. The original bill did not contain this provision.

3. Under this bill the directors of the corporation will be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The original bill provided for the appointment of the directors by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President.

4. This bill limits the advances to be made to banks, bankers, or trust companies to loans made by such banks, bankers, or trust companies on securities or obligations acquired since the declaration of war (Apr. 6, 1917) and outstanding at the time of the advance, and to loans made to persons, firms, corporations, or associations conducting an established and going business in the United States. The original bill did not contain any limitation of this nature.

5. This bill permits the corporation to make advances to savings banks, banking institutions, or trust companies which receive savings deposits and to building and loan associations for not to exceed one year. The original bill limited the time for which an advance could be made to 90 days and did not give this privilege to trust companies receiving deposits or building and loan associations.

6. This bill requires the security for advances made to savings banks and similar institutions to be equal to at least 133 per cent of the amount of the advance. The original bill specified that the security should be equal to 125 per cent of the amount of the advance. This change is made in order to make the ratio between the advance and the security the same in all the provisions of the bill.

7. This bill provides that when the corporation makes advances direct—that is, without the advance going through the banking channels—that the corporation must require security equal to at least 133 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation, and also that the rate of interest charged on such advances shall not be less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper in the Federal reserve district in which the borrower is located. This bill also contains a limitation as to the amount of advances that can be made under this section at any one time to an amount equal to 16⅔ per cent of (1) the paid-in capital stock of the corporation at such time plus (2) the aggregate amount of the bonds of the corporation authorized to be outstanding at such time. The original bill contained no such limitations. It is believed that these limitations will afford a very valuable safeguard to the corporation and will result in requiring a greater portion of the business of the corporation to be transacted through regular banking channels.

8. This bill limits the aggregate amount of advances that can be made and outstanding under this act at any one time to any person, firm, corporation, or association to an amount not to exceed 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation, or $50,000,000. The original bill contained no such limitations. This provision is also believed to be a very valuable safeguard.

9. This bill requires the corporation to file quarterly reports with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, giving the name and place of business of each person, firm, corporation, or association receiving advances direct from the corporation, the amount advanced, the terms, and the security accepted therefor. The original bill contained no such provision.

10. This bill limits the power of the corporation to deal in bonds and obligations of the United States to those issued or converted since September 24, 1917 (the time the last bond act became a law). The original bill would have permitted the corporation to deal in any bonds or obligations of the United States.

11. This bill authorizes the corporation to issue $2,000,000,000 of bonds to mature in not less than one year nor more than five years. The original bill authorized the corporation to issue $4,000,000,000 worth of bonds.

12. This bill provides that whenever a Federal reserve bank discounts or rediscounts paper secured by the bonds of the corporation that it shall not discount or rediscount such paper at a less interest charge than 1 per cent above the prevailing rates for eligible commercial paper of corresponding maturity. The original bill left the interest rate to the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board. It is believed that this provision will afford a very valuable safeguard to the Federal Reserve System.

13. This bill provides that before paper secured by the bonds of the corporation can be discounted or rediscounted by a Federal reserve bank that the member bank must satisfy the Federal reserve bank that it does not have in its possession for the purpose of discount sufficient commercial paper eligible for discount or rediscount under the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made under authority of the Federal reserve act. The original bill contained no such provision.

14. This bill contains no provision, as did the original bill, permitting member banks of the Federal Reserve System to deal in the bonds of the corporation.

15. This bill creates a Capital Issues Committee, to be composed of seven members, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to investigate, pass upon, and determine whether or not it is compatible with the public interest that there shall be sold or offered for sale or for subscription any issue or part of an issue of securities the total or aggregate par or face value of which is in excess of $100,000. The original bill authorized the corporation to investigate and license or refuse to license the sale or offering for sale or subscription of securities the par or face value of which were in excess of $100,000. It is believed that the issuance of new securities will be limited, in most cases, under the provisions of this bill, to those compatible with the public interest, as effectively as would have been possible under the original bill which was much more drastic.

16. This bill contains no criminal penalty provision for any sale or offering for sale of any securities issued when the Capital Issue Committee has found the issue of such securities incompatible with the public interest. The original bill provided a penalty of $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than four years, or both, for any violation of any of the provisions of the act or of any license, order, rule, or regulation issued thereunder.

17. This bill provides that the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation. The original bill made no reference to the liability of the United States for the payment of the obligations of the corporation.

18. This bill makes anyone who (1) forges or counterfeits any bond, coupon, or paper in imitation of or purporting to be in imitation of a bond or coupon issued by the corporation, etc.; or (2) embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any money, funds, or credits of the corporation, etc.; or (3) with intent to deceive any officer of the corporation, makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the corporation, etc., liable to a penalty of $5,000 or to imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

The original bill contained no similar penalty provision.

I shall discuss the measure on the basis of the large scope of the original bill and the Senate measure, each of which provides a capital of $500,000,000 and an authorized loaning power beyond that of the capital of $4,000,000,000. I would impress, by way of comparison, because all things in this world are relative, the magnitude of this corporate creature which we are calling into being.

First. It has the stupendous capital of $500,000,000. That is seven times the amount of the capital of the 12 regional banks of the United States. A recent statement shows their capital $73,624,000. It has an authorized loaning power of four and one-half billions of dollars. That is more than four times the amount of the loans and discounts, of whatever character they may be, including all earning assets of the reserve banking system at this time, which are $1,097,322,000.

Second. The capital of this corporation, $500,000,000, lacks very little of being one-half of the total capital of all the national banks of the United States combined. The figures, which probably should be raised a little as they are the figures for 1916, are $1,066,000,000. So the capitalization of this corporation, $500,000,000, lacks little of being one-half of that.

Third. Five hundred million dollars capitalization is greater than that of any 200 national banks in the United States.

Fourth. The loans of four and one-half billion are more than one-half the loans and discounts of all of the national banks of the United States, stated to be $8,818,312,000.

Fifth. This authorized loaning power amounts to nearly twice the amount of the loans and discounts in the mutual savings banks of the United States, stated at $2,368,691,357.

Sixth. It amounts to more than all of the loans and discounts in all of the State banks of the United States, which are $4,111,555,000.

Seventh. The loans and discounts now in all the national, State, private, mutual savings, and stock saving banks, combined with those of the loan and trust companies of the United States, amount to $20,000,000,000. So the loans authorized by this gigantic corporation are 22 per cent of all of the loans and discounts in all the banks and related institutions in the United States. It seems to me that, large as that is, it should be safeguarded in every possible way, both in the grant of power and in the matter of administration.

Eighth. I call attention to another fact. The loans authorized by the original bill is a larger sum than all of the deposits in all the following great national and international banking concerns combined:

The Imperial Bank of Germany	$1,131,771,750
The Bank of England	867,495,250
The National City Bank, of New York	735,104,800
The Bank of France	436,339,950
The Credit Bank of Austria	388,310,700
The National Bank of Argentina	319,954,500
The Bank of Montreal	295,432,900
The Commercial Bank of Italy	235,768,200

They had a total of deposits, on the 1st of January, 1917, of $4,408,178,000, nearly $100,000,000 less than the authorized loaning power of this great corporation, which was sought to be brought into being through the bill as introduced, which we, of course, have reduced from a basis of 45 to a basis of 25. That is, capital, $500,000,000, and additional loaning power, $2,000,000,000.

Ninth. If all these loans were made, and the interest had to be paid in gold, the production of gold in the United States—$92,000,000 in 1916, the latest figures I could obtain—would pay only 2 per cent on the loan authorized.

Tenth. The loaning power of this corporation or bank, whatever you may call it, is twice as great as the assets of the 22 leading industrial corporations of the United States, hereafter named in the prewar period, use as a basis for war-taxing purposes:

The Bethlehem Steel Co., the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the United States Steel Corporation, the American Car & Foundry Co., the American Locomotive Works, the Baldwin Locomotive Works, the American Smelting & Refining Co., the Anaconda Copper Co., the American Sugar Refining Co., the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., the American Tobacco Co., Central Leather Co., Corn Products Co., General Electric, Mexican Petroleum, Pittsburgh Coal, Sears-Roebuck, and United States Rubber companies. Their combined assets amounted to $2,130,000,000. That is less than one-half the amount of the loaning power of this great corporation.

Eleventh. The loaning power of this corporation perhaps equals one-half of the gold in the world outside of the arts, estimated at $9,000,000,000.

Twelfth. It would build 12 Panama Canals and buy their respective sites.

Thirteenth. It would buy the United States corn crop of 1917, with millions to spare.

Fourteenth. It would pay practically all of the public debt of this country—National, State, county, school, and municipal—before the war began.

Fifteenth. It would buy, with half a billion dollars to spare, the property of all kinds and character in the State of Nebraska.

Such is the bill that was first proposed in the House, has come from the Senate, and may be urged in conference. The foregoing figures and staggering comparisons suggest potent reasons why we should retain all the changes made by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not get the reference to the State which the gentleman represents. What was the relationship of Nebraska to this national corporation?

Mr. SLOAN. All of the property of Nebraska, estimated at $4,000,000,000, would be half a billion dollars less than the authorized loaning power of this great corporation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, as a matter of fact, the organization of this system would be a mere bagatelle to that great State.

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, no; I should be pleased to say that our State could swallow up a corporation of this kind, but, standing in front of Washington's picture and in the city bearing his name, I can not tell it that way. This corporation has a loaning power of $4,500,000,000, while the property of Nebraska amounts to only $4,000,000,000. This corporation overshadows great coal, steel, and oil corporations in the old Keystone State—a State that is honored by the representation of the distinguished gentleman now acting as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for the minority.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I had intended to say that the State of Nebraska has been so well represented by the gentleman in this House that I assumed its general assets had mounted up so high that the organization of a war finance corporation would be a mere bagatelle to the Commonwealth.

Mr. SLOAN. I have been endeavoring to represent merely a portion of the State, but unfortunately it has not been able to increase in wealth to keep pace with the fiat of a Government creating corporations. But in per capita wealth it stands fourth in the Union, which, of course, sets it ahead of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a tribute to the gentleman's faithful service here; he certainly has not enriched himself in this representative capacity, except in the friendship of his colleagues.

Mr. SLOAN. I trust the committee will refuse to take notice of this blush of mine.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. With pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. SLOAN. Always truthful.

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). Who sits close to the head of the Republican side in the Ways and Means Committee, on which the gentleman from Nebraska serves with great distinction, seems to be in doubt as to what State the gentleman who is now speaking is from. To what does the gentleman attribute the ignorance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he asks such a question as that?

Mr. SLOAN. I refuse even to consider that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is ignorant on any subject. It would be a reflection upon the subject to say that he knew nothing about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is quite right about that and the statement of the gentleman from Illinois upon this occasion is unaccountable. There is no reason for it except to afford an excuse for joining in the compliment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania was endeavoring to pay to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. After Illinois and Pennsylvania I yield to the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman if outside of all this that has been brought out by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he thinks this is quite a worthy measure?

Mr. SLOAN. Notwithstanding anything the gentlemen may have said, it is a measure that will probably obtain the support of nearly every Member of the House, not only those Members who usually vote in a body, but those of independent purpose and character who do not fear to be in the minority if right and might seem not well paired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All of which goes to show that the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania agree that while they should very much regret to lose the membership here and the association of the gentleman from Nebraska, they hope he will continue to rise higher and higher until he sits in another body of this Congress, though not quite so distinguished as this.

Mr. SLOAN. To which proposition I do not even reserve the right to object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is always modest, but too modest on this occasion for his own good.

Mr. SLOAN. Whatever my good may suffer from whatever cause I know I have friends in this House who will become my champions should occasion ever require.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. May I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that a number of the corporations he mentioned with great capital had homes in the great State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just spoken is always loyal to the Keystone State. It is a great State. I think it is the greatest State on earth for one to have his parents married in. The fact is I selected it for the matrimonial contract of my parents. But, of course, great as it is, whoever having the opportunity to come to Illinois, Iowa, or Nebraska would certainly be derelict to their duty if they did not leave Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SLOAN. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I have watched the distinguished statesman from the State of Nebraska during his membership in the House with a great deal of interest, and I recognize in him one of the leading men of the Nation, who would reflect credit upon any State, to say nothing about Nebraska, one who will perform any function that will devolve upon him with ability and distinction. The people of Nebraska have reason to be proud that such a man speaks for them upon the floor of this House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. They will be still prouder if they shall take the first opportunity to select him to speak for them on the floor of the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the statement the gentleman has just made on behalf of the great Commonwealth of Illinois he at last agrees with the greater Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MADDEN. It is a great pleasure to know that occasionally Pennsylvania gets into the right line, that it sees straight, that it can recognize good in a man coming from an agricultural region such as that from which the gentleman from Nebraska hails.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All of which I take it means SLOAN, of Nebraska.

Mr. MADDEN. And so I want to assure the people of Nebraska that I regret exceedingly to learn that they have commandeered our friend to enter the race for another body, and, having commandeered him, we sincerely hope that they will use the wisdom which they have thus far displayed to the extent of selecting him and commission him to speak for them in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. One thing I am greatly interested in is to know whether any of my distinguished friends who have "spoken my praise" happens to be the seventh son of a seventh son, because only to them is true prophecy granted.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLOAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts with the same readiness that I would to any other delightful temptation.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman, in making inquiry with reference to prophecy, will recall that some time ago he did me the great honor of asking me to make a speech in his district. I want to assure him that at that time I took occasion to indulge in a prophecy which I find is being substantiated by my colleagues, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]; and that if I should have occasion to revisit that section of the gentleman's great State it would afford me great pleasure to tell the people of his district, or to say to them when the gentleman shall have been selected for a higher station in the legislative branch of the Government, "I told you so."

Mr. SLOAN. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for what he says here and what he said on that occasion. Do you know it is true that he spoke in the heart of my district, and that at the election following my majority was largely increased over what it was at the preceding election.

Much has been said and may be properly said about legislation suggested by heads of departments and by the executive branch. Some good, perhaps, can sometimes be done in that way. I do not here and now join in any particular criticism of that kind of legislation. This is true, that wherever there has been an Executive there has always been a desire to increase his power. It would be unnatural for a man in power not to ask for its increase. This fact was long dwelt upon by the framers of our Constitution. It was as strongly guarded against as seemed possible. But it was left largely with the representatives of each branch to zealously defend its own jurisdiction. The fault lies as fully with those who permit this invasion as those who would invade. We, as a great legislative body, perhaps should not be too seriously critical of those who would ask for grants of power. The criticism should come to us if we unduly grant it.

The bill that has been prepared by an executive department has been adverted to frequently. In order that history may be kept on straight, I shall ask that that bill be made a part of my remarks, so that it will be easy to compare what is finally granted in this bill with that which was originally asked. And I shall also offer the report of the committee showing the important lines of departure from the original bill.

And in addition to that I call your attention to one of the most important State papers issued during this war period. It was written by the Secretary of Agriculture, the Hon. David F. Houston, in which he discussed, and I trust the Members of this House will take occasion to read it at length when the opportunity presents, a system of legislation in a country with which we are now at war. He discusses the Reichstag, and says, among other things:

THE REICHSTAG NOT REPRESENTATIVE.

"But," it may be asked, "how can this be? The Reichstag is the popular house of the imperial parliament, and its members are elected by universal suffrage. Is this not conclusive evidence of popular participation and control?"

* * * * * * *

The Reichstag is little more than a debating society. It was intended to be nothing more—to be a "sop" to the progressives. Its powers are great on paper but exceedingly small in reality. It has the constitutional function of passing on the budget, but the principal revenue laws are permanent. The Reichstag can neither increase nor decrease the schedules nor make any change in the existing situation unless the King of Prussia wishes it. This comes about in this way: The Bundesrath is the upper house of the imperial parliament. Its members are delegates from the various States, representing several State governments, and not the people. They vote according to instructions, and one member may cast the vote for any delegation. Fourteen members can defeat any measure, and the Government of Prussia—that is, the King of Prussia—controls 20 votes.

The Reichstag does not really initiate legislation. Important measures are first discussed in the Bundesrath; then they go to the Reichstag and back to the Bundesrath for approval. The initiative, for the most part, comes from the chancellor, who is also prime minister of Prussia. The ruler, as Emperor, may instruct the chancellor to prepare a measure; as King he may order him to introduce it and may direct amendments to be made and prevent changes.

I suggest these three documents as important for the consideration of every Member of the House of Representatives. In saying that I do not reflect upon any executive department or upon any executive, but I wish to call to the attention of the Members of the House that if criticism ever does come it will not be more upon those who may demand undue power than upon the Members of the body whose duty it is to preserve to the people that power and who supinely grant that which was unduly asked. I think our highest duty is to preserve intact the functions and jurisdictions of this, the greatest and freest deliberative body anywhere throughout the world. [Applause.]

I think, perhaps, gentlemen, my time is nearly up, but I desire to say in closing as a final reason for supporting this measure that when the battle line established by Hindenburg the Hun, under the combined might of America and the seasoned strength of those who fight with us, has been smashed; when the arrogant Hohenzollern whose savagery added to civilization makes him the satanic personification of the century in his mad emulation of the mighty Macedonian, the imperial Roman, and the powerful Corsican, shall fall short of universal dominion; when his degenerate son, crazed by the ghosts of Verdun, shall desperately cling to the crown of a diminished Germany; when the allied powers shall take up the greatest burden of all time in the rehabilitation of continental Europe; and when the statesmen of our own great country shall be solving the problems of our post-war period, there will come a clamorous demand upon us as to why we enacted this colossal legislation. Its proportions, judged by its apparent effects, will be better reviewed and understood then than now. Our only answer in that day will be "We surveyed our circumstances; we considered our national needs; and acting in part upon the advice of those to whom the American people gave executive control, guided by our best judgment and the highest dictates of patriotism, created this weapon of war."

May we hope that it shall be placed in the hands of those who will so wield it that instead of an excuse or defense we may submit a modest boast? [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the present paramount purpose of the American people is the winning of the war. To the fulfillment of that purpose within reason all else must for the time be subordinated. The first and compelling duty of the Congress is to enact such legislation, grant such authority, and make such appropriations as in the opinion of those charged with responsibility, in position to know conditions and qualified to judge of them believe to be essential in the carrying out of the Nation's purpose—that of strengthening the Nation's arm abroad and maintaining the best possible conditions at home.

It is from this point of view that I shall consider the legislation now before us. That it is radical, almost revolutionary, there can be no question. That it proposes a grant of power and authority which might be abused none who have carefully considered it can doubt. That under normal conditions it would not be seriously considered no thoughtful person will deny.

In this situation the one vital and controlling question is, Is legislation of this character necessary? Must some such legislation be enacted in order to so support and strengthen the financial and economic structure of the Nation as to enable our people to effectively bring to bear all of the Nation's mighty resources in the prosecution of the war? Must it be enacted in order to maintain the sound and safe industrial and economic conditions necessary to the winning of the war?

On this proposition I confess that after most careful and thoughtful consideration I am by no means free from doubt. The measure as presented to the Committee on Ways and Means was beyond question very objectionable and highly dangerous from any reasonable and legitimate standpoint. The measure as presented to us, after careful and painstaking scrutiny and consideration of the committee, is greatly improved, and I think it susceptible of further improvement when the House shall consider it under the five-minute rule.

It is true that the existence of certain conditions among the industrial and financial institutions of our country, as pointed out and suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury and others who appeared before the House committee, comes to us as something of a shock. It is true that the conditions thus outlined and portrayed raise a question as to the soundness of administration policies. It is true they constitute a serious reflection on the Federal Reserve System, which was purposed and promised to be so adaptable and elastic as to successfully tide us over times and conditions of stress and emergency.

It is true that it ought to be possible to so extend and simplify the provisions of the Federal Reserve System as to care and provide for a situation even as trying as that of the present emergency.

Were the expansion and extension of credit claimed to be necessary attempted or provided through the Federal Reserve System rather than through a new corporation and a new committee, all the machinery and organization of the Federal Reserve System could be utilized. It is proposed instead to establish what amounts to a new temporary Federal banking system, appoint a lot of new officers, and go to all the expense of building up a new enterprise of vast proportions. This seems like a rather roundabout and expensive way to secure the desired result.

While all these things are true, and the dangers of credit expansion, of unwise or ill-advised administration, of favoritism, or even worse must be admitted to be ever present in legislation of the scope and character of that proposed, we can not evade or safely disregard the evidence presented on behalf of the measure. Those largely responsible for the conduct of our financial system during the war, those who should be qualified to judge as to the financial, industrial, and economic situation in the country as affected by the war insist that there is a condition demanding the strengthening of industry and the sustaining of credit through some Federal agency. There is an equal insistence that it is not wise or practical at this time to so modify and adjust the Federal Reserve System as to meet the situation.

In view of these facts and argument I feel it my duty to resolve the doubts I entertain in favor of the legislation and support it, reserving the right to carefully consider such amendments as may be offered.

After all is said and done, the success or failure, the good or ill, which flows from a measure like this, largely depends on the character of the men called upon to administer it. That they should be men of sound integrity goes without saying. It is equally true that they should be men of ripe and mature judgment and wide experience. It is of the highest importance that the War Finance Corporation and the capital issues committee, provided for in this legislation, shall be so constituted that the people of the country shall have confidence that their action shall not be colored or tinctured by partisanship, favoritism, or local interest. It is in the hope of such wise appointments and of fair and faithful administration that I give my support to the measure, trusting it may aid to sustain the institutions, the labor and the industry of our country to the successful winning of the war, which is the present paramount purpose of the Nation.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. MEEKER. We understand that the original bill was sent in by the Treasury Department?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that was stated by the chairman of the committee in his opening speech.

Mr. MEEKER. And that bill was so absolutely unsound that it could not be considered for a minute?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think perhaps that is not entirely a fair statement of it. The committee did, however, change the bill quite radically.

Mr. MEEKER. And we propose to give that same gentleman jurisdiction over the finances of the country in this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. You mean in this bill the gentleman who proposed or suggested the original measure is at the head of the institution proposed to be established?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that is true, but I do not know that it follows that a man, having sought more authority and jurisdiction than he ought to have, can not be trusted to wisely administer such limited authority and jurisdiction as the Congress sees fit to give him.

Mr. MEEKER. The point is this: Here is the financial representative of the administration. He comes to the committee asking for more with a bill which none of his own party will permit to be brought to the floor of this House, and yet it is proposed to hand everything over to that same man carte blanche under this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman refers to Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury. All men are human and all seek power and authority and control, sometimes in excess of what they should be given, and it is the duty of the Congress, and that duty has been exercised in this case, to restrict and control in the grant of power. Congress has wisely exercised its authority in that regard in this case, and even then it is granting an authority so broad that it might easily be abused. But in all human affairs we must trust some one, and in this particular crisis we must trust those who have been placed in posts of power and authority. Most people seem to think we need some additional financial legislation. Whether we provide it in this way or through the Federal reserve banks, Mr. McAdoo, as Secretary of the Treasury, will have large influence.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has read the bill as reported?

Mr. MONDELL. I have read it very carefully.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And he observed, in answer to the question just put to him by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER], that the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury have been somewhat curtailed.

Mr. MONDELL. Very greatly curtailed, I should say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that extension of power which the gentleman from Missouri referred to is not so extensive in the bill as it might have been?

Mr. MONDELL. Not nearly so extensive and all-pervading as it would have been under the legislation as first proposed. No man should have so wide a control over the affairs of the people, even in time of war, as the original bill gave the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it fair that that statement should go into the RECORD.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill has been very greatly improved. In the form in which it was introduced I could not have supported it. In the form into which the committee moulded it, after careful consideration I am glad to give it my support, though I have some doubts and some fears. I am depending somewhat upon the judgment of those who ought to know and who spoke before the committee, and still more on the good judgment of the members of the committee.

We are doing many things in this time of stress and war which we would not think of doing under other conditions. We are confronted by the anomalous situation that, engaged in a war to promote and strengthen and establish and sustain democracy, we are adopting temporarily the methods of autocracy. But we are not doing it because we love autocracy. We are doing it because we believe that only in this way can we bring the mighty forces of the Nation into effective coordination, in order that we may win the war. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this bill, apart from the provisions of section 200 to 205, which create and define the powers of the Capital Issues Committee, creates practically a new bank of gigantic proportions, to some extent an independent bank, and, generally speaking, an intermediary between the present commercial banks and the Federal Reserve System.

Now, the Federal reserve banks have a capital, all told, of $73,000,000; yet this corporation is given a capital of $500,000,000. I have heard that it was given a capitalization of $50,000,000 as the bill was originally drawn, but then an extra cipher was stuck on for good measure before it was introduced. It ought to be understood, it seems to me, that there are other ways of doing what this corporation expects to do, and that they would probably be much less expensive. The Federal Reserve System, I believe, could handle this situation, as my friend the gentleman from from California [Mr. HAYES] has said. I have seen no direct testimony from the Secretary of the Treasury or from Mr. Warburg, or from anybody connected with the Federal Reserve System, to the effect that it would be unequal to the task of handling the matter, of taking care of the securities and credits that are contemplated to be taken care of under this bill; and, in fact, the only real relief provided by it that I can see, apart from the loaning of the $500,000,000 of capital, is that the credit issues—the bonds, so-called—of this corporation can be taken by the banks to which they will go as collateral and can be used as a basis for discount in the Federal reserve banks and for issues of Federal reserve notes.

Now, the Federal reserve banks are thoroughly sound. They had combined reserves over both notes and deposits on the 1st of February, 65.2 per cent. At the end of the month they were 66, and on Saturday last, according to the statement published in the New York newspapers, they were 64.5 per cent. A year ago they were 87.6. Gold reserves last Saturday were 62.5 per cent, and a year ago 86.1 per cent. That shows a pretty good-sized drain on the financial system during the year, but a year ago the Federal Reserve System was hardly at all used. The banks had hardly begun to make rediscounts, had not begun to ask relief, except a very few banks in some sections of the country. Of course, now they are seeking loans from the Federal reserve banks, and largely with bonds—Government bonds—as collateral for their notes. It would be a mere extension of power to allow them to loan, under certain conditions, on notes secured by other good bonds.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman comes from the great State of New York. I want to ask him the question if there is a necessity for some legislation of this character?

Mr. PLATT. I think there is.

Mr. GARNER. The only difference the gentleman has with the committee that reported this bill is that the believes the relief could be given under the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. PLATT. Not the only difference with the committee; but the relief asked for under this bill could be given by the Federal Reserve System. Nobody connected with the Federal Reserve System has said that it could not be. It would be very much simpler and less expensive if it could be given in that way. I am not necessarily contending that it should be so given, but that it could be.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not necessary to pass legislation of this character giving relief to the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. PLATT. I believe some legislation is necessary, but not necessarily this legislation.

Mr. GARNER. You say you would not undertake to give it to the Federal Reserve System at this time, but that if it was necessary you would do it?

Mr. PLATT. I feel, with the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, Mr. GLASS, and with gentlemen who are connected with the Federal Reserve Board, that the Federal Reserve System ought to be kept on the basis of handling commercial short-term paper. But you must all admit that the central banks in Europe handle this kind of paper—that is, paper secured by bonds or stocks—and the Federal Reserve System could do it, and I believe with safety.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says that he believes that some relief is necessary. The gentleman comes from the great State of New York. I ask him the question whether he did not believe some relief should be had. I ask him now how he would give the relief.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman does not give me a chance to develop any argument. With one section out of this bill, I do not know that I am greatly opposed to the plan here proposed. But I want to point out that it is a very cumbersome and very expensive system of doing something that could be done in another and much simpler way.

This bill creates another great new institution, another set of commissioners or trustees at $12,000 a year each. It will be annother addition to the tremendous bureaucracy already established, with elaborate offices, and many clerks and stenographers, and it is to do something that present institutions could do with some amendment to the Federal reserve act.

Our national banks all make loans on stock and bond collateral. The big banks, like the National City, the Chase National, the First National Bank of New York, and the Bank of Commerce make a large part of their loans on such collateral. Very often short-time loans are made on stock and bond collateral. Some of those notes are really commercial notes. The merchant puts up collateral that he happens to have because it is handy, and he can get a low rate of interest, perhaps; but those notes can not be taken to the Federal reserve bank and be rediscounted. Consequently the banks are chary in such times as these about making these loans and about furnishing money to be used for the capital requirements of any large corporation. They have done it in large amounts heretofore, and they could do it now if the Federal reserve act were so amended as to allow rediscounts under proper restrictions, such as are provided in this bill, directly through the Federal Reserve System. I share with my friend from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], as I have said, his doubts as to the expediency of doing that. This proposition has the one advantage, and the only advantage, of being a separate thing; it is limited to a certain period and will then go out of existence, while if we allow the relief to be given through direct rediscounts in the Federal Reserve System I am not so sure that you could limit it to any period, certainly not so easily.

Mr. GLASS. I was going to suggest to my colleague that the fact that the National City Bank and other large commercial banks do make extensive loans on stock-exchange collateral does not justify the practice for reserve banks. My friend knows very well that that was the curse of the old banking system. The very fact that these loans were made on stock collateral prevented these banks in times of emergency from responding to the commercial necessities of the business communities of the United States, and their failure to respond was reflected in smaller communities of the United States, and that very thing brought on panics. It was to relieve that situation that the Federal Reserve System was established—to cut the banking community of the United States away from that system.

Mr. PLATT. That is true, generally speaking, but, nevertheless, it is absolutely essential that some banks shall make loans on stock and bond collateral security. At that time the National City Bank and the big banks of New York City were the real reserve banks of the country. They were at the bottom of the whole system. Now they are not. The Federal reserve banks stand back of them.

Mr. GLASS. I am not opposed to banks making loans on these securities to a limited extent, but what we had before was all the reserve funds of the country thrown into that vortex, and we broke that thing up. I am utterly opposed to an approach to anything like a resumption of that kind of thing.

Mr. PLATT. And I am myself, but I do not feel so sure as the gentleman that we could not authorize some loans from Federal reserve banks on such security with proper safeguards for the period of the war.

Mr. HAYES. I should like to ask the gentleman if he can see any difference between allowing the Federal Reserve System to take care of these obligations direct—that is, through the business channels now provided, with a little amendment—and permitting them to do it through the bonds or obligations of this proposed corporation? Is there any difference?

Mr. PLATT. I really think that there is no fundamental difference, and the only advantage of this thing is that it is self-limiting, and when the war is over it will stop.

Mr. GLASS. Is not that an immense difference?

Mr. PLATT. It is an immense difference, but at a tremendous expense.

Mr. GLASS. We recognize that this is an unprecedented emergency, and we establish an auxiliary method of doing the thing, having it understood, however, that it is not to be regarded as at all normal or as at all permanent. And then I call the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] to the fact that we penalize the privilege here.

Mr. PLATT. That is true.

Mr. GLASS. We do not permit rediscounting, except under penalty, and a pretty stiff minimum penalty of 1 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. Of course we could put that same penalty on for similar direct rediscounts.

Mr. HAYES. Sure.

Mr. PLATT. And have direct loans made from the Federal reserve banks to the member banks on the same kind of paper.

Mr. GLASS. That was not the question asked. The question was if we could not go right along in the usual, normal way and do this thing. I am opposed to doing it at all; but if you have got to do it, I want it done under a penalty. I want it distinctly understood that it is an unprecedented emergency, and that the only justification of it is that it is an emergency.

Mr. PLATT. We have got to do it, and we have got to find some way for the Federal Reserve System to help out, and that is what we are doing. We are putting another institution in between the Federal reserve banks and the business of the country, so that its paper can be substituted for ordinary stocks and bonds and put into the Federal Reserve System. The advantage of it is that it will stop after the war without much difficulty, but it is an enormously expensive way to do it. It would cost much less to do it directly, and I am not sure but that the capital of the Federal reserve banks could be added to by the Government, and in that way let the thing be done directly instead of in this indirect way.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him again? I do not want to annoy him, but I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. PLATT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from California for a brief question.

Mr. HAYES. I want to ask if we could not put that limitation in an amendment just as well, that would make it apply to the Federal Reserve System, as to put it into this bill?

Mr. PLATT. I am not sure that you could not.

Mr. HAYES. So that automatically it would end with the end of the war.

Mr. PLATT. It seems to me possible to do that, but I think there are certain advantages in doing it this way, apart from section 9 of the bill, which provides for direct loans not going through the banks. I do not believe there is any necessity for that section.

Secretary McAdoo spoke of it as being put in there to take care of "those rare cases" where a corporation could not get capital accommodations from the banks, and certain instances of power companies, and so forth, were mentioned in the hearings, and I understand certain other cases were mentioned in executive hearings that were not published. But I want to call attention to the fact that the greatest matter of refunding corporation notes, that of the New York, New Haven & Hartford, $43,000,000 of one-year notes, that fall due in April, the largest amount of corporation notes falling due on any one day during the year 1918, has already been taken care of without this act, and taken care of by selling new 7 per cent preferred stock, and by some help from the railroad $500,000,000 revolving fund. Now, so far as this matter applies to public utilities and railroads—and they were made much of in the hearings—they can all be taken care of by simply treating them in a common sense way. Their rates have been held down while all their expenses have gone up. Their purchasing power has been decreased and they have been starved. All you have got to do is to give them for the service they render the same purchasing power that they had before the war, and that is the common sense, fair, decent way to do it. Then they will take care of their own obligations. The confidence of the investing public will be restored, and that has got to be done. Already the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is about the slowest body on the face of the earth to move, has given the eastern railroads a 15 per cent increase on commodity rates. Why they limited it to commodity rates I do not know, but they did. But that is a good deal, and if they had done it six months ago it might not have been necessary for the Government to take over the railroads. They always fish behind the light. They are always late in doing everything. Now, if public utilities everywhere are treated in the same way, they will not need to be helped by the Government or by any such corporation as this.

The largest flotation of the year has already been taken care of, and unquestionably all these things can be taken care of through the banks if they are treated by common-sense methods. There will not be any necessity of direct loans from this corporation to any industry or corporation, if this corporation can occasionally help out the banks which finance the necessary war industries by rediscounting notes based on bonds or collateral. Neither Mr. McAdoo nor Mr. Warburg made out a very good case for the direct loans provided for in section 9.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask what assurance have we that the 15 per cent advance to the railroads is going to amount to anything? Suppose the demand from the railroad employees should absorb the 15 per cent, then you have got to give them 15 per cent more.

Mr. PLATT. If we are going on to grant every demand that comes along, that is what ought to be done. It ought to be known that the people are going to have to pay for these continued advances and demands by increased rates.

Mr. Chairman, I had intended to say something about the necessity of providing some relief for the savings banks, but that was sufficiently covered on Saturday by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], and my own statement in the hearings also covers it. I repeat that my chief objection to this bill is to section 9, which I think unnecessary and dangerous. If it can be stricken out, I should vote for the bill with no very serious misgivings, though without feeling entirely sure that it offers the best solution of the problems at hand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement of about a minute. I think we will all agree that at least at 4.30 we ought to adjourn in honor of our deceased colleague. Now, in order to do that, suppose the debate goes along until 4.25, and then I ask unanimous consent, when the committee rises and goes back into the House, that we meet at 11 to-morrow, and that general debate proceed until 10 minutes after 12, and then go into the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. I ask if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the remaining debate will be adjusted between those hours?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and your side can have all except five minutes to-morrow.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course there is much demand for time under general debate that will not be accommodated. If we agree to that plan, will the gentleman have it tacitly understood that in the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule there will be some latitude for debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is to be any hope in that that we can get through to-morrow——

Mr. STAFFORD. We can not forecast the length of time that will be occupied under the five-minutes rule on this very important bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is a very important bill, and we have given two days of general debate to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The most of the debate has been taken up by the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. The opposition had all the time it asked for. It was understood between us all that the opposition would have two and one-half hours and that that was satisfactory, although they wanted more. We agreed yesterday afternoon that general debate should close when we adjourned this evening at not later than 5.30. So if we adjourn at 4.30 and have an hour and ten minutes to-morrow it will be what we agreed upon Saturday.

Mr. HAYES. The arrangement was made that those opposing the bill should have two hours and a half or one-third of the time whatever it was.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? With respect to what the gentleman from California has just stated, I want to say that on Saturday night tender of time was made to the gentleman from California and his colleagues opposed to the bill. This morning the first opportunity was afforded them. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] took one full hour. Subsequently another hour was given to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That made two hours. Then 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], so that there has been as fair an arrangement as could possibly be made. Now, 15 minutes more are assured to the gentleman in opposition.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say, too, that I have cut out eight Members who wanted to speak, so that we could give you gentlemen on that side all the time that was possible and adjourn early this afternoon.

Mr. HAYES. We had an understanding that we were to have one-third of the time, and that would take care of us all right.

Mr. KITCHIN. I asked the gentleman if two and a half hours would be sufficient, and I understood him to say that would be satisfactory. I tried to guarantee him that two hours and a half.

Mr. HAYES. Can not we continue general debate to 1 o'clock to-morrow? There are others who will have something to say.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would be all right if we could hurry up and not ask for extensions under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAYES. This is an important bill and many amendments are going to be offered.

Mr. MONDELL. It does not seem to me that it will be possible to conclude the bill to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us do the best we can. I will say to the gentleman and to the committee that I am not going to cut off bona fide debate on fair amendments to perfect the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I thought we could reach an agreement better if we realized how impossible it is to conclude the bill to-morrow night.

Mr. GILLETT. Let me suggest that a good many Members who could not get time in general debate wish to state briefly their position on the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would be under the five-minute rule; yes.

Mr. GILLETT. That will take some little time, I am sure.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us make this arrangement that I suggested, and I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and all others that we will not have any disposition to cut it off.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the purpose of my making that suggestion.

Mr. KITCHIN. This is a very important matter and we should, if possible, quicken the passage of the bill. There are other bills to come after this which should be disposed of as early as possible. We must have another bond-issue act, and we ought to get that through by at least March 26, for the reason that they hope the Treasury Department can start another liberty-loan campaign on April 6, a very psychological time, as we declared war on April 6 a year ago. It will take a week, or about two weeks, to get the advertisements in shape and the machinery going to put this campaign over, and they can not do that until they know exactly the authorization of the bill. That is the reason I am pushing this as much as possible. Will there be any objection to the request I made awhile ago when we get into the House?

Mr. HAYES. I would suggest that the gentleman make it 1 o'clock.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the gentleman will get his half hour.

Mr. HAYES. If the gentleman says that, all right.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will get it if we have to give it to him under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I have heard two principal speeches and a part of a third one to-day. I have been very busy about other matters. I could not be here constantly, but when I have dropped in for a few minutes at a time there has been present only about the number that is present here now, so that the real consideration of this bill before the House will be under the five-minute rule. If I am here, as I shall probably not be, most of to-morrow, for I shall have to be in conference, I am going to ask that there be a quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman means when we get into consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; that is the real debate, and I do not believe that you can close this thing or ought to close it to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, this measure, known as the War Finance Corporation bill, is so completely at variance with all previous methods of loans on business transactions and with normal methods of doing business that opposition to it from men experienced in banking matters was perfectly natural. I think I am breaking no committee confidences when I say that my personal idea, gathered from various members of the committee in informal conversation, was that when the original bill was introduced the Committee on Ways and Means was not disposed to favor the legislation. To-day the committee is unanimous for its passage, and two things have brought this result. One, an explanation by the Secretary of the Treasury and by Mr. Warburg of the absolute need of the bill, and, second, various changes that the committee has made from the original form.

That the bill is purely within the scope of a war measure was made very plain in Mr. Warburg's testimony, as was stated by the gentleman from Michigan on Saturday. In answer to a question as to how he regarded this kind of legislation in normal times, Mr. Warburg replied it would be "absolutely rotten." The fact that it is war legislation is recognized in the life of the corporation it establishes, whereby the affairs of the corporation cease within a limited period after the close of the war.

The proposed legislation is extremely drastic, but I for one am convinced that it is thoroughly needed. I agree with criticisms that have recently been made on the floor of the House against accepting every piece of legislation desired or proposed by anyone of the executive departments on the plea that forms in which offered carry with them the only possible correct method.

In a recent issue of the Springfield (Mass.) Union appears a striking cartoon showing Mr. McAdoo starting out for work in the morning. He has seven different jobs, and the final one is the general manager of the $500,000,000 United States corportation. This is further illustrated by the following squib from a Philadelphia newspaper:

Poor Mr. McAdoo!
Think of the jobs he's hitched up to—
The Treasury, the railroad crew,
The income tax, and then a few.
Each week they hand him something new
To tax his time and temper, too.
He has to know when loans are due,
What source to get his billions through,
What fund to pass each dollar to,
Which tax is what, and who is who;
What bonds to sell and what renew,
Which "trust" to coax and which to sue.
He stretches out each day to two
To do the things he has to do.
The job would flounder me or you,
But its a cinch for McAdoo!

[Laughter.]

In the formation of the War Finance Corporation, Mr. McAdoo desired complete authority in the appointment both of the board and of the capital issues committee. This power has been, in name at least, taken away from him in that the appointments must be made by the President and confirmed by the Senate. We have also very much abbreviated the powers of the capital issues committee. Briefly the situation is this. The original bill would not be recognized by its own father. The idea of its need came from the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill giving the necessary machinery to the administration has been framed by the Ways and Means Committee. We recognize that it carries with it huge possibilities of inflation of credits, but this is not the time when normal objections hold good.

Capital must be provided for carrying on the industries necessary in the conduct of the war, and, as the Government is requiring practically the entire business of the country, it is proper that it should furnish the capital with which to carry on the business. All large business requires extension of credit, and that is exactly the foundation of this legislation. The Government is engaged in a stupendous business proposition requiring unlimited capital, and is asking assistance of the going business concerns of the country in carrying on its business. In order to have such business successfully carried on, it must provide the capital through a system of loans and credits. That is what this bill does. It establishes a Government board able to extend cash credit to the banks to the amount of $500,000,000, with an additional loan of two billions through bonds or notes. It not only puts this amount into circulation, but the amount that this will offer as credit when this is itself loaned through the various channels.

The opponents of the bill argue that an extension of the power of the Federal Reserve Board could provide extension of credits to business. The Federal Reserve Board is recognized as a great success in general methods of banking. One of the basic principles of the organization is it handles only liquid paper, whereas in this bill long-time collateral in the issuing of bonds and stock will be accepted. The marked difference between the two is readily recognized and the two kinds of collateral ought not to be handled under the same auspices.

The willingness shown to pass this bill is another illustration of absolute harmony in the management of the war and the desire of all parties to work together to the one aim of its satisfactory conduct and conclusion. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10608, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the former order closing debate this afternoon be rescinded, and that general debate upon the War Finance Corporation bill close to-morrow at 10 minutes after 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the former order touching the general debate upon this bill be rescinded, and the general debate proceed until 10 minutes after 12 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield? Suppose somebody should make a point of no quorum, thereby cutting out a portion of the time?

Mr. SISSON. We will not let them do it.

Mr. FESS. Suppose there is some order or——

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, we will make some other arrangement.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not say an hour and 10 minutes for general debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. In order that we may have a certain time? I will ask unanimous consent again if anybody makes the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the pending bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JOHN H. CAPSTICK.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce to this House the death of my colleague, the Hon. JOHN H. CAPSTICK, late a Representative from the fifth district for the State of New Jersey. Mr. CAPSTICK died yesterday morning at his home, Montville, N. J., shortly after 10 o'clock. I shall not attempt at this time to say anything regarding his good qualities or eulogize him in any way, but I shall at a future date ask that a day be set aside on which to pay tribute to his character and valuable public services. I send to the Clerk's desk the following resolutions:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 286.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JOHN H. CAPSTICK, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That a committee of 16 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. EAGAN, GLASS, HAYES, PARKER of New Jersey, PHELAN, WOODS of Iowa, SCULLY, BROWNING, HAMILL, DRUKKER, BACHARACH, HUTCHINSON, RAMSEY, GRAY of New Jersey, LEHLBACH, and LINTHICUM.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the additional resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 19, 1918, at 11 o'clock.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Labor, transmitting a list of useless papers in the Department of Labor (H. Doc. No. 977); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a proposed draft of a bill to establish certain new ratings in the Navy (H. Doc. No. 978); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 979); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting an itemized report of audit of accounts of American National Red Cross for the year 1916, made by the Inspector General of the Army (H. Doc. No. 980); to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication of the Postmaster General submitting an urgent estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 981); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

Also, resolution of the American Society of Equity, urging modifications in grain-grading act; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, resolution adopted by Farm Managers' Association of Fargo, N. Dak., asking that if deferred classification can not be obtained that the call be postponed until after the crop is planted, owing to necessity of retaining skilled farm labor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 19, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have come to the tragic time when patriotism means death, when the challenge of our devotion to our country puts in the balance the lives of many men, if not our own death the death of our boys whom we love better than our own lives. O God, grant us wisdom and grace as we make every preparation for the test that has been brought to us, that with clear judgment, with conscience void of offense, and with a consecration to the great purpose to which we are committed, we may be led on of God to the complete victory for the ideals for which we stand in the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of Montana for the submission of a constitutional amendment to give women the right of suffrage, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 2.

Memorial to the Senate in Congress of the United States to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution and submit the same to the several States for ratification, extending and giving throughout the United States the right of suffrage to women.

To the honorable Senate in Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent:

Whereas the State of Montana has granted the franchise for the ballot to the women of this State and accorded to them equal political rights; and

Whereas the woman's suffrage in this State has been conducive to good government, has purified our politics, made better homes, and the ennobling influence of Montana's womanhood, exerted at the polls, has been for the best interests of this young and prosperous Commonwealth; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate in Congress of the United States a measure known as the "Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution of the United States," the purpose of which measure is to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending and giving throughout the United States the right of suffrage to women, and which measure has been passed by the House of Representatives, and is now pending in the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That we, the members of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session assembled, do hereby petition and earnestly pray the Senate of the United States that such measure so proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending and giving throughout the United States the right of suffrage to women, be passed and submitted to the several States for ratification; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Montana to the Senate of the United States; and that copies hereof be transmitted to the Senators in Congress of the United States from the State of Montana.

JAMES F. O'CONNOR,
Speaker of the House.
W. W. MCDOWELL,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 23, 1918.

S. V. STEWART,
Governor.

Filed February 23, 1918, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.

C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Montana, ss:

I, C. T. Stewart, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 2, petitioning the Senate in Congress of the United States to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution and submit the same to the several States for ratification, extending and giving throughout the United States the right of suffrage to women, enacted by the extraordinary session of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, and approved by S. V. Stewart, governor of said State, this 23d day of February, 1918.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State. Done at the city of Helena, the capital of said State, this 12th day of March, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.]

C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of the live-stock division of the National Food Administration for Montana, of Missoula, Mont., praying for the opening of certain withdrawn areas for the purpose of grazing, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the live-stock division of the Food Administration for Montana, praying for the enactment of legislation giving homesteaders credit for certain work performed on the homestead, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the live-stock division of the Food Administration for Montana, praying for the suspension of the operation of the 640-acre homestead act during the war and for one year thereafter, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition of sundry citizens of Altoona, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, of Local Branch No. 47, Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, of Sheffield, and of the National Woman's Party of Chambersburg, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Typographical Union No. 77, of Erie, Pa., praying for an increase of pensions to veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Newspaper Publishers' Association, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the recoinage of the 2-cent piece, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have here resolutions passed by the Kansas State Live Stock Association at the annual convention in Wichita February 28, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading. They are very short.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has declared that our present and immediate task is to win the war; and

Whereas he has set forth that the chief aim of the war is to secure a permanent peace guaranteed by a partnership of free nations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Kansas State Live Stock Association pledge its loyal support to the Government of the United States in the prosecution of the war; and further be it

Resolved, That the members of the Kansas State Live Stock Association, individually and as a body, in every available manner make known the high purpose and object of the war, to the end that at its conclusion a league of nations to safeguard an enduring peace may be established; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Senators representing the State of Kansas at Washington, and to the Hon. William H. Taft, president of the League to Enforce Peace, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a brief telegram from citizens of my State, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and also a letter in regard to Federal prohibition and conservation of food, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HATTON, N. DAK., March 16, 1918.

Senator ASLE GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Three hundred citizens of Hatton and vicinity, North Dakota, respectfully request Congress prohibiting during war and reconstruction period the manufacture, sale, and transportation of all intoxicating liquors and nonessential beverages consuming large quantities of cereals, foodstuffs, man power, and transportation facilities now needed for winning of war.

T. T. JORNHOM.
T. E. TUFTE.
E. G. KERR.

NORTH DAKOTA WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION,
Fargo, N. Dak., February 15, 1918.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The executive committee of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of North Dakota, in session at Fargo, February 13, 1918, by a unanimous vote extend to you the thanks of the 3,000 women whom they represent for your work and vote for the Federal prohibition amendment.

We also most respectfully urge and petition you to use your influence and vote for the enactment of a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of any intoxicating beverages during the war and the period of demobilization. We also urge that Congress request England and France to forbid their people to sell or give any intoxicating liquors to our soldiers.

Yours, sincerely,

ELIZABETH PRESTON ANDERSON,
President.
BARBARA H. WYLIE,
Corresponding Secretary.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3874) providing medals for certain persons, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 317) thereon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9571) to authorize the appointment of officers of the Philippine Scouts as officers in the militia or other locally created armed forces of the Philippine Islands drafted into the service of the United States, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 319) thereon. I ask that the bill take the place on the calendar of the Senate bill 3780, of a similar title, and that the Senate bill be postponed indefinitely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9903) to provide for restoration to their former grades of enlisted men discharged to accept commissions, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 320) thereon. I ask that the bill just reported by me take the place of Senate bill 3800, of a similar title, now on the calendar, and that the Senate bill be postponed indefinitely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Some weeks ago I introduced the bill (S. 4013) to amend certain sections of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee has had that bill under consideration, and the action taken was to report an original bill, which I now do. The precedent, I believe, in similar instances where a bill was reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] from the Committee on Military Affairs was that the bill was twice read and placed on the calendar. I therefore report this bill and ask that it take that course.

The bill (S. 4138) to amend certain sections of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

STATUE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

Mr. KNOX. From the Committee on the Library I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 70) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 318) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. What was the request of the Senator?

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

DEVICES FOR PROTECTION OF TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE WIRES.

Mr. OWEN. On March 13 I introduced Senate resolution 214, calling for certain information, and I ask that leave be granted to dispose of it. It is a very short resolution. I will ask the Secretary to read it, if there be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 214 submitted by Mr. OWEN on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby requested to immediately advise the Senate as to the available devices known to the War Department to prevent spies from tapping telegraph or telephone wires over which messages are sent by the War Department and to what extent such devices are employed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CASUALTY LISTS OF AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

Mr. NEW. On March 9 I submitted a resolution, Senate resolution 211, and on March 11, at my request, it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it has been favorably reported from the committee. I should like to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is not on the calendar. It is in the committee.

Mr. NEW. I will ask unanimous consent to present it at this time with a favorable report from the committee. I was under the impression that it had been reported. It has had favorable action by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana assumes the responsibility of reporting the resolution?

Mr. NEW. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reports the resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 211 submitted by Mr. NEW on the 9th instant, as follows:

Whereas it has been stated in the public press of this date that the War Department in publishing the casualty lists of the American Expeditionary Forces now abroad will hereafter give names of soldiers only, withholding anouncement of their residence and next of kin: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the War Department be requested to inform the Senate if such an order has been issued, together with the reasons for it, if not inconsistent with the interest of the service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire if the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. NEW. It was.

Mr. FLETCHER. And is now reported by the committee?

Mr. NEW. Yes, sir.

Mr MYERS. Is there a request for immediate consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. MYERS. I object, and I will state to the Senator from Indiana why, with all due respect to him. My reason for objecting is that I am opposed to the resolution, and I shall oppose it whenever it comes up for action.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I trust the Senator will not object to the information being given to the Senate. That is all it asks for, and it is a serious matter with every Senator. Correspondence is constantly coming to us and we have no way of answering it. Would there be any possible reason why the department should not give us this information?

Mr. MYERS. I am opposed to the resolution. The information has already been given. A statement has already been given out by the War Department to the public press of this city, which we can read as well as others, that it is done at the request of Gen. Pershing; and for me that is sufficient. When our commander in chief on foreign soil says he wants this done I think that is enough, and it would seem to me that it was time that the War Department was doing something or other that is not subject to criticism by this body and by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator know that Gen. Pershing wants this information suppressed? That is one of the things the Senate would like to understand.

Mr. MYERS. It was given out by the War Department in an authorized statement to the press of the city, and if the Senate Committee on Military Affairs wants any further information I think the proper source would be for the committee to ask the Secretary of War or some representative of the War Department to come before the committee and give the reasons for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MYERS. For the reasons I have stated, I will object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then it goes to the calendar.

COAL OUTPUT IN COLORADO.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have the honor to submit the last information from the seat of fuel activities in Colorado. It is conveyed by telegram, from which I quote:

Herewith report on tonnage loss by mines, being down to Saturday: Fifty-five mines, total 21,200 tons; men at mines out of employment that day, 4,335. Normal output of all mines in State per day is about 40,000, or 1,000,000 tons a month. Saturday's loss, therefore, shows loss of over 50 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Over what period?

Mr. THOMAS. Fifty-one per cent of last year's output. Twenty-one thousand two hundred tons a day, Mr. President, are the equivalent of 636,000 tons a month, 7,622,000 tons per year. Four thousand three hundred and thirty-five men out of employment at $5 a day is the equivalent of $21,675 a day, or $650,250 a month.

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I ask the Senator from Colorado if he is informed of any reason for this? I should like to have the reason stated.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; on the 8th day of March the Fuel Commissioner issued an order reducing the price of coal to the operators at about the equivalent of cost, together with a further reduction to take effect beginning with the summer month of April, which at our altitude of more than a mile above sea level is a month quite as rigorous and disagreeable as are December and January.

I regret, Mr. President, to make these constant reports to the Senate, but I have exhausted every other means to secure redress and publicity is consequently my last alternative.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I observe in the morning press, I would like to say to the Senator, that Great Britain is actively employed in keeping up her export business in order that she can carry on her business after the war ends and not disintegrate her industries. I think the Fuel Administrator might be better advised if he would not take the steps necessary to close down American industries but to keep American industries active.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Fuel Administrator is discharging the duties of his office as he thinks he should. I make no reflection either upon his good intentions or upon his desire to comply with the law. But unfortunately there is a certain place mentioned in holy writ which is paved with good intentions.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to say to the Senate that recently the glass factories of Oklahoma that use natural gas were closed down under the influence of this branch of the Government, and that gas will be in a measure dissipated through the layers of earth because those wells are now plugged up and the material will be wasted. The men in those glass factories are thrown out of employment, and the only effect of it was to permit those who had the glass already made to raise the price of glass upon the American people while these laborers were thrown out of employment.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it was Rochefoucauld who said that we derive some pleasure from the misfortunes of our friends.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4139) repealing certain provisions contained in the urgent deficiency act approved December 22, 1911; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TILLMAN:

A bill (S. 4140) to establish certain new ratings in the United States Navy (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 4141) providing for the better administration of justice in the Navy (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 4142) for the relief of Mary A. Sutton; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXCESS RENTALS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9248) to prevent extortion, to impose taxes upon certain incomes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9054, being the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when the producer fails to produce, the consumer will not be able to consume. We are told, and we are told truly, that one of the essential elements in this great war is the question of food, of production. There never has been a time, Mr. President, in the history of the world when the question of the production of food was of as great importance as it is now. There never was a time before in the history of the world when the production of food was absolutely vital to success. In all other contests there have been enough neutral nations, enough neutral people, to supply food for the armies and the belligerents, even though the production of food in the belligerent nations had absolutely ceased. But, Mr. President, in this war, with practically every civilized nation of the entire world engaged as a belligerent on one side or the other, there is an absolute necessity for the production and the conservation of food that never before existed in history. Of all those articles of food necessary for our Army, for our people, for the armies and the people of our allies, and for the people of some of the neutral nations, perhaps the most important one is wheat.

There is a shortage of wheat in the world. There is not enough wheat to go around. The people of the world will not be able in the next year to eat all the flour that under ordinary circumstances they would consume; and regardless of the price, regardless of what it costs, unless we are to run great risk of collapse, there must be a production of wheat greater than under ordinary conditions. We must have bread. The world must have bread. It must have wheat. We want to conserve every kernel of it. Therefore any system that will encourage the production of wheat is a step in the right direction, and a necessary step. A corollary to it all is that the man who produces wheat must receive a financial return that will pay him at least a reasonable profit for its production compared with the profit growing out of the production of other things that can be produced on the same soil.

Congress had that in view, Mr. President, when in the act of August 10, 1917, known as the food-control act, it gave to the President the right and the authority to fix a minimum price on wheat; and I want to clear away now a misunderstanding that exists to some extent in the country, and I think to a small extent even in Congress, that Congress by legislative act fixed a minimum price, or a price of wheat for the 1917 crop. In the food act, after giving the President the authority to fix the price of wheat for 1918 and subsequent years if the war should last, Congress fixed the minimum price of wheat of the 1918 crop—that is, the crop that will be harvested in 1918—at not less than $2 a bushel.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator has made a statement that he would not want to let go without attention being called to it. If I understood him correctly, he said that the food act had given the President the authority to fix the price of wheat. It gives authority to fix a minimum price.

Mr. NORRIS. I meant a minimum price. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. I want to say, and I want to keep on saying it until I have impressed it on every man in the Senate, that there is not in the food bill the authority to fix the price of a single foodstuff.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. REED. And any man who has undertaken it has been a usurper, and just to the extent that he has succeeded he has been a lawbreaker.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when Congress said that the price of wheat for the 1918 crop should not be less than $2 per bushel, it had no idea, it had no intention, of interfering with the ordinary law of supply and demand for any price that might exceed that figure. There was no idea of interfering with the law of supply and demand except to say to those who would plant wheat for the 1918 harvest that they should be paid at least $2 a bushel for it. No one here or elsewhere, as far as I know, had any idea that anyone thought for a moment that we were delegating to anybody the power to fix, or that we were fixing by statute, an absolute price for that crop. We passed the statute because some thought that the war might end before the 1918 crop could be harvested, and therefore there would be danger that people would not expand their wheat-planting operations as they otherwise would, for fear that if before their crop was harvested the war should end and the price should go down they would not be able to get enough to pay the actual expenses of putting in the crop, even the seed of which at that time was very high.

I want to call attention now to that particular phase of this question so that we may get what I believe to be the true perspective.

There was no intention of interfering with the law of supply and demand. There was no attempt even to fix a minimum price for the crop of 1917. But in the same law we gave to the President the power to license the elevators and mills, and so forth; and our Government being one of the largest buyers of wheat for our Army and our Navy, for the armies and the navies of our allies, for the people in all the allied countries, and even for the people in neutral countries, having power to buy that wheat, to license elevators and millers absolutely, it had the power to fix the price—indirectly though it may be, but effectively, without any question, the absolute price—of the 1917 crop, which had been produced and was in existence on the 10th of August, when that law became effective. So that the price which has been fixed by the President for the 1917 crop has been by virtue of those indirect powers, and on account of no direct statute of Congress, and Congress in no way undertook to fix by statute the price of the 1917 crop.

When we had that bill up, Mr. President, I voted against the provision fixing the price. That was before the Food Administration had gone into operation, although, if I remember rightly, I called attention to the fact that the other powers that were in the bill might enable the President to make the minimum price the maximum price. That is, in substance, what has been done. As I said, it was the theory of Congress to let the law of supply and demand take its course, if the war did not stop in the meantime. The day we passed the law wheat was selling at $2.50 to $3 a bushel in different parts of the country, although the market then was uncertain because of the uncertainty of the provisions of the pending food bill. Later on, before I close, I shall read some of the testimony of Mr. Hoover, given before the Agricultural Committee, in which he fully bears out the statement I have just made—that no one favoring the food bill had any idea that the powers conferred by it would be used to depress the price to the producer.

As I said, I voted against fixing that price at that time. I did not want to interfere in any way with the powers that we had given to the President in the matter, and it seemed better not to fix the price by statute. Since that time the Food Administration has been in active operation and the President has fixed the price of wheat of the 1917 crop and the 1918 crop, in both instances much lower than the crop would have sold for if the law of supply and demand had been allowed to take its course; and that is absolutely contrary to the very intention of Congress in the legislation. Every man who had wheat of the 1917 crop in the United States when the price was fixed practically donated $1 for every bushel he owned.

I think the farmers would have been willing to do that without complaint if at the same time the things they had to buy were likewise cut down in the same proportion; but this was not done, although the same law gave the President the power to do it. The wheat producer of the crop of 1917 had the price of every bushel cut down practically $1, while he saw the price of nearly everything he had to buy go soaring to the skies.

The result of fixing the price of wheat at a much lower figure than it otherwise would receive and sell for in the open unrestrained market has been to increase the demand and therefore the price of all wheat substitutes. That means that the consumer must pay a higher price for all those substitutes.

Mr. REED. For an inferior article.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; for an inferior article.

Mr. REED. They make him buy it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; as the Senator from Missouri says, they make him buy it. They make him buy it even when he can not use it.

The object in getting the price of wheat down was to help our allies, to whom we must ship a large quantity of wheat, and who use the wheat rather than the corn and some other substitutes that we can use here. So that for the sake of getting a lower price of wheat for the allies we increased the price of corn and barley and rye and oatmeal and rice and almost every other article of food to all the American people, even conceding that we lowered the price of wheat to them. The amount of wheat that each individual eats in a year is a comparatively small matter when taken in dollars and cents. Now, Mr. President, I concede that we ought to get the wheat to the allies as cheaply as we can without doing an injustice to anybody else; but we are under no obligations to compel the American farmer to produce that wheat at a less profit than the same soil can be used to produce a substitute for wheat. That is unfair, unjust, and ought not to be required.

But that is speaking, you might say, just from the selfish standpoint. That is speaking just from the standpoint of profit. We ought to take, also, a broader view. As I said in the beginning, if the producer ceases his operations the consumer can not eat. In the end, Mr. President, it will be found that the consumer will suffer more than anyone else where the producer must produce at a loss, because he ceases to produce, and if the food is not produced, all the price fixing under heaven can not get it to the consumer. If it is produced in abundance, the effect will be to get it to the consumer at a lower price.

Now, there are three views to take of this matter. I have gone over them all briefly.

First, without regard to cost or anything else, we must have the wheat. If there were nothing else in it, no matter what it would cost, we must have the wheat produced. It is better to have wheat even at a high price than not to have wheat at all.

Second, it is unjust and unfair, even an injury to the consumer, that the wheat should be produced at less than cost and without a profit to the man who produced it when he can put his land to other uses and produce the substitutes at a profit.

Third, that kind of price fixing interferes with production and lessens it, and, on the broad world basis, if you lessen the production of a staple article like wheat, that we must have all over the world, to the extent of making it less profitable than the production of other cereals on the same soil, you have in the end increased the cost of living of everybody and made victory for our cause more remote and difficult.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not alone the production of wheat, which, I think, is exaggerated somewhat in its necessity, but it is a fact that we do not conserve its substitutes that we have. I read from an unusual authority in the Senate, from the sixth chapter of John, of the New Testament:

> When Jesus then lifted up His eyes and saw a great company come unto Him, He saith unto Philip, Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?
> Philip answered Him, Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them, that every one of them may take a little.
> One of His disciples, Andrew, Simon Peter's brother, saith unto Him, There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many?

I have just been reading from the Statistical Abstract of the United States where more than 2,000,000,000 gallons of beer were brewed out of this same barley that might have been wasted for bread. We will never learn to fight an autocracy on this plan, because the American people are not a beer-drinking population. The authority given in the food act, commonly known as the Hoover act, says that "whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes," is necessary to conserve other resources, he may prohibit the use of them.

I am ready to testify that not only in Biblical times, when the new dispensation began, barley loaves were nutritious but that they are fit to eat now. I eat partly barley bread. If the Senator will permit me trespassing upon his time a little, it is as nutritious for a person engaged in physical exercise as wheat bread and much healthier for persons engaged in a sedentary occupation. But that is one of our resources that there is no conservation of. The price-fixing problem is not one of my institution; it came by other authority than by my vote. Like the junior Senator from Missouri, I had a pair, and did not vote. I would have voted against it if the Senator with whom I was paired had been present. We have engaged in this enterprise, which I think is an endless task. Having embarked in it, we must pursue it to its logical conclusion. While we are doing that, instead of taking all these untoward means to increase the consumption, we had better save what we have now. If our allies can not eat corn bread, we can. If they can not eat barley loaves, as they did in Galilee, we can send them the wheat, and save the barley and the corn and the rice used in brewing beer and its imitations in this country, so that we may have an increased quantity for our home consumption.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to talk about the conservation of food, because the particular motion before the Senate is not one of conservation, it is one of production; but since the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] mentioned it, I will say that, as far as I am concerned, I am ready to discuss here in the Senate the question of beer. I do not believe a bushel of wheat or any other food product in America ought to be used to make beer while we are in this war and trying so hard to conserve food. They not only use millions of bushels of grain but they use thousands of tons of coal and thousands of cars in the manufacture and transportation of beer. Since the 10th day of August when that act was passed it has been in the power of the President to suspend every brewery and close every saloon in the United States. I am sorry he has not suspended them. I voted when we had that bill up here for a provision that would have suspended them without the intervention of any act of the Executive, but from that time on every brewery and every saloon in the United States has been operating at the mercy and with the consent of the President, who has had the power at any moment by a stroke of the pen to conserve all the food that they put into beer.

Mr. President, as a fundamental proposition I do not believe in legislative price fixing or in governmental price fixing. I can see where it is necessary, where there is a combination or a monopoly which unduly enhances the price to the consumer; and that was the main object, as I understood it, of the food administration bill, so as to prevent between the producer and the consumer, by those who must necessarily or unnecessarily handle the product an undue and an unfair and an unjust enhancement of the price. Nobody ever contended that in the production of foodstuffs on the farm there was a combination or a monopoly of those who produced them. There are too many of them and they are too widely separated, even if they had the inclination. So there was no necessity for the Government to step in and set the price that the producer should get. There might be in the travel of this food from the producer to the consumer many places where governmental interference might be justified and ought to be undertaken. As an illustration of the necessity of such an instance I might mention the packers. However, the administration, while regulating them, permits them to make a profit of from 9 to 15 per cent under rules which will result in many instances in a much higher rate of profit on the actual money invested in the business while the feeder is actually losing money on every head he fattens. The idea of the law was to regulate monopoly—to prevent profiteering, not to drive the producer out of business by compelling him to produce at a loss.

But, Mr. President, contrary to that theory, contrary to the very intent of that law and of Congress when it passed it the price of wheat to the producer has been fixed by the President and fixed at a price that is lower, as every man who has studied the subject must admit, than he would otherwise have obtained under the law of supply and demand uncontrolled and uninterfered with.

Now what is the condition? The proposition now is to make that price $2.50 for the 1918 crop, and Senators object to it because they say it is a legislative fixing of the price. It is a legislative attempt to remedy a situation that as the Senator from Illinois says we are already into; we can not get out of it. This price has been fixed by Executive order so low that the law of supply and demand with the producer of wheat all over this country has been nullified, and this is an attempt in reality to come somewhere near putting that law back into force and effect.

I wish to read a little of the testimony from some of the witnesses.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator is probably going to read some testimony to show the necessity for doing something, but he has just made a statement in regard to the law of supply and demand having been interfered with that was very forcibly and clearly put. However, he did not state how it had been interfered with. I desire merely for the sake of illustrating the Senator's statement to call attention to the fact that the proposition we now have before us is to fix a price by law or to permit a price to be fixed by monopoly agreements which have been made for the purpose of controlling the price, and if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I will read from a speech of Mr. Julius H. Barnes, who is the head of the Food Administration wheat section. Mr. Barnes is a great board of trade man, thoroughly familiar with the wheat business, and in his speech, which he made January 17 at the La Salle Hotel, in Chicago, he relates how the food bill came into conference, and he uses this language:

> And the food bill finally passed, declaring its purposes to be to prevent private control and establish public control of necessities—and then without a single effective weapon in it—> except an obscure clause which permitted voluntary agreements. And this bill, which came out of conference curtailed, robbed, and shorn of its power, was the only bill on which we had to build, and almost in 48 hours a plan had to be constructed to take control of the wheat crop of America, and to so fairly control it that it could be apportioned not only to satisfy our needs but to discharge obligations to our allies, which we were beginning to recognize as pressing and sacred. And it was only through the clause of voluntary agreements that any effective control was possible under the food bill as it passed—> that we sought to create a price monopoly in this country by that weapon of voluntary agreements, when by enlisting so many of the mills with us, enlisting them to aid us by working under our direction, and, through the grain corporation, securing in our hands the agreement of the allies that all of their needs should be provided through that channel, taking advantage of the fact that the embargo had shut the neutral from our market. It was on that basis that a public control was proposed of this most vital crop. And when we had established by voluntary agreements a practical monopoly, the responsibility to make the price on the chief crop of America almost appalled us. Then a price commission was evolved, and after considerable hesitation they recommended to the President of the United States that a fair price, all things considered, was $2.20 per bushel for the No. 1 grades at Chicago; and in response to the obligation laid upon the grain corporation by the President, we have endeavored from that day to this to fairly reflect that Chicago basis into every grade and every market.

Now, notice this language—

> It was on September 4 that that price was put into effect as a buying basis by the grain corporation, and from September 4 to this time there has been no fluctuation even of minor wheat in the wheat price of America.

Will the Senator let me say here, just in addition to this remarkable statement, that these so-called voluntary agreements are not voluntary agreements?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course they are not.

Mr. REED. The miller is brought in. He is told by the law he must take out a license, and he is in effect, if not in words, told that as a condition of that license he must comply with all the orders that come down to him, and among those orders that have been issued to him, and I have some of them, has been an absolute command that he shall pay only a certain amount for his wheat. In addition to that, he has been forced to sign agreements which compelled him to pay to the grain corporation 1 per cent on all the wheat handled by him. As I stated the other day, that will amount to over $12,000,000 this year.

Tuesday, March 19, 1918.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned last night I was about to take up a brief consideration of some of the evidence that has been introduced before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on the question of wheat and wheat prices. Before I take up that evidence I want to read an extract from the testimony given by Mr. Hoover, the Food Administrator, before the passage of the food-administration bill last summer. His testimony was given before that committee on the 19th day of June last. Mr. Hoover was speaking in reference to the food-administration bill, which was then pending before the committee, and among several other statements he testified as follows:

> From a number of current illusions about the legislation proposed, the first is the illusion in some quarters that the bill is directed against the producer. It would not be necessary to traverse this statement to anyone that had read the bill. It specifically excepts the producer from every one of its provisions, with the exception of one section, and that is the provision for a guaranty, and this section is designed to entirely benefit and secure the producer. The savings of the American consumer ought not and should not be made by a sacrifice on the part of the producer. They should be made by the exclusion of speculative profits from the handling of our foodstuffs.
> The second illusion is that there is price fixing by this bill. There is no provision for price fixing, and no such thing can be carried out under the bill. What we hope to do is to stabilize prices by various devices and to regulate the profits and speculation out of handling commodities.

Mr. President, I agreed most fully with Mr. Hoover at that time, and I agree now, that that was the intention of Congress when it passed that legislation. Had nothing been done in the administration of the law contrary to the ideas outlined by Mr. Hoover, I do not believe we should be surrounded by many of the difficulties which now confront us so far as production is concerned. Under that statement, which was made by the man who was going to be, as everybody knew, in charge of the administration of the law, I think every producer of every character everywhere in the country had a right to assume that if, in answer to the request of his fellow citizens and of the Government, of the President, and of the Food Administration, he went ahead in the production of food products, he would be rewarded at least fairly for the outlay and the effort. The patriotic farmers of our country manfully responded to that appeal, only to discover later that the wheat producer and the meat producer were to be recompensed under the very law that was intended for their protection, by an arbitrary fixing of their prices that brought to them a loss as compared to other products where the law of supply and demand was permitted to have its usual sway.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska from what pamphlet he is reading?

Mr. NORRIS. I am reading from the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and specifically from part 2, page 92, of the testimony of Mr. Simpson, who quotes the testimony which was given by Mr. Hoover on the 19th of June, 1917, before the committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Have we a report of the testimony of Mr. Hoover on the day referred to?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; I assume that we have. I have no doubt of that. I was present and heard the testimony. I can not quote it literally, but I assume this is a correct and literal quotation of Mr. Hoover's testimony.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a most significant statement and one that ought to be placed beyond question.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any question about it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I may say that I have on my desk an official copy of Mr. Hoover's testimony from which the quotation read by the Senator from Nebraska was taken.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to repeat my statements of yesterday in regard to wheat conditions, but I am going to read just a small portion of the testimony of one or two of the witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and the testimony will illustrate the general rule. Testimony to the same tenor has come to the committee from practically all over the United States; I do not know of any exception to it. There appeared before the committee a Mr. Simpson, of Oklahoma. Mr. Simpson is known by the Senators from Oklahoma, and particularly by the chairman of the committee [Mr. GORE]. He would impress anyone who heard him and listened to his statement as being a fair-minded, honest, patriotic, intelligent citizen. He was and is an actual farmer; he is president of the Farmers' Union of Oklahoma; he is also the president of the Association of Presidents of Farmers' Unions. In speaking of the condition of wheat in Oklahoma, he testified as follows:

In Oklahoma we make around 3,000,000 acres of wheat, or better, and I believe there is at least a third of that wheat that can not possibly make more than from 4 to 6 or 7 bushels to the acre right now. It would not make any difference how favorable the weather is from now on, it could not make more than from 4 to 6 or 7 bushels to the acre, and with the $2 price on wheat at Chicago, as it is now for 1918 crop, it would not be worth while to let that wheat stand; we would have to use the ground for something else. If the price was made sufficiently high so that we could afford to let that wheat stand and harvest it, it would save probably several million bushels of wheat.

Mr. President, Mr. Simpson has given the condition of a large part of the winter wheat in the winter-wheat belt. I know it can be said—and ordinarily that would control my vote and settle the question with me—that we are under no obligation to pay a high price for wheat when the yield of the wheat is small and when the ground would be worth more if put into something else. Under ordinary circumstances I would not offer this as one of the reasons why we ought to increase the price of wheat, but confronted, as we are, with a shortage of wheat, with a shortage of bread, and with a necessity for a large production of wheat with which to feed ourselves, our Army, the allies, and the neutrals, knowing that the crop of 1918, under the most favorable conditions which can exist from now on, is going to be short—under those circumstances we ought to make it within reasonable bounds an object to men who have wheat now standing not to plow it under this spring in order to put the land in corn or some other crop. I submit that that is one of the things we ought to consider. If we can save five or six million bushel of wheat by increasing the price it is our duty to do it, because it is absolutely necessary to have more wheat to insure victory to our arms. If we can not have bread hunger and perhaps disaster stare us and our allies in the face. Wheat is essential to victory, and to a great extent the responsibility for its production is now on us.

I am not going to discuss conditions in other localities, because that is a fair sample of the conditions that exist in the entire wheat belt.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say to the Senator that it came to my attention last Saturday that one farmer who has 800 acres sown to winter wheat intends to turn all of it under, if he can get the labor, and plant the land to a more profitable crop.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President, it is a simple proposition as I look at it. The farmer goes out and looks at his wheat and sees its condition. He says, "That wheat will, if the weather is ordinarily favorable from now on, yield 5, 6, 7, 8, or 9 bushels an acre, as the case may be. I had better put that into corn; I can not afford to let that ground lie idle and raise a crop that will bring a loss when I can make money by putting it into something else."

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. The farmer decides the question then and there. If the value of the wheat is going to be increased, then it will have a tendency to keep the land in wheat and to let it go to harvest. It is only a question as a financial proposition, whether it is good business to plow it or leave it stand, and that question is decided to a great extent by the value of the crop. I now yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, in that connection I desire to state that in my State, where we planted nearly 10,000,000 acres of wheat last year, the latest reports I have from the State board of agriculture show that approximately 5,000,000 acres are to be plowed up and put into oats, corn, sorghum, and other crops.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. As I said, it is the same everywhere in the wheat belt.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say to the Senator that the wheat grown in ordinary years in the semiarid sections of the country, where the yield per acre is low, is essential to constitute our surplus for export. Eliminate that, and we fall below our own consumption.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Simpson says:

I work largely at organizing the farmers' unions in my State, and I am with the farmers day and night in that work—organizing the locals. Some one in the neighborhood will take me in a car during the day around where we are going to meet at a schoolhouse that night. I frequently see 25 or 30 farmers in a day on their farms, and invariably when you talk to them about hogs they say, "Well, I am just keeping enough for my own meat." I am on their farms and know what they are doing. That is about the hog situation in Oklahoma.

Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss the hog situation or the cattle situation or the sheep situation at this time, because the question before the Senate is purely one of wheat. At a later date, on the proper occasion, I expect to go somewhat into details in regard to the production of food animals, and I think the facts in that respect are as startling as they are in regard to wheat. I wish to read what Mr. Simpson says about the feeding of wheat to hogs:

Mr. SIMPSON. One of the worst effects of the fixing of a price on wheat is that it has not conserved the little bit we raised this last year. Now, I am giving you what I would be willing to go before any court and swear to, that in going around to these farms—and I am frequently on 25 different farms every day in the week—nine times out of ten they will tell me they have fed some wheat. I remember seeing not long ago in the little town of Rocky, in Washita County, a farmer come in with 24 head of hogs in 3 wagons that he said he had fattened on wheat. They weighed 240 pounds apiece, and that certainly took not less than 300 bushels of wheat. I have been on lots of farms where they told me they were feeding from 4 to 5 bushels a day. The reason for that is plain, they could not haul off a load of wheat and with the money bring back as many pounds of corn.

There was a Mr. Hyde who came to Washington from Oklahoma, sent here by the State council of national defense to see the Food Administration and the President and lay before them the condition which existed there in regard to wheat. He came before the Committee on Agriculture, and, speaking of the price of wheat, testified as follows:

The effect is this: They made wheat so much cheaper than the other cereals that a great deal of wheat was fed. Mr. BARNES—

He is president of the wheat corporation and one of the officials under Mr. Hoover in the Food Administration—wired Mr. Sykes and myself that he would come to Oklahoma City, and that he wanted to get information at first-hand. He is president of the wheat corporation. I wired him the condition. He wanted to know the "conditions at first-hand"—that is, in his wire. I wired to farmers all over the State to come in and see him. I also wired to the county demonstration agents, and here I have a synopsis of the telegrams I received, telling whether the wheat was being fed or not. I have not all of them here. These are just what I showed Mr. Barnes that day.

Then Mr. Hyde goes through the list, and from every county that produces wheat in the State of Oklahoma came the same report. I will just read a few as samples:

Wheat fed in Comanche County, 100 bushels per day.

Guthrie—Logan County, 50 bushels of wheat per day being fed; 2,500 bushels will be estimate for amount fed this fall.

Anadarko, 55,000 acres; from 200 to 300 bushels of wheat being fed each day.

Mangum, 200 bushels of wheat fed daily; 20,000 bushels will be fed this fall.
Clinton, 400 bushels of wheat fed daily; 30,000 bushels will be fed this fall.
Alva, 300 bushels fed per day—

And so on through the list of counties.

Mr. President, that is not only true of Oklahoma, but that is true in the State of New York; it is true practically everywhere in the United States; it is true, says the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], in his State. It is bound to be true wherever corn is worth more than wheat.

That is an item that we ought to consider in raising the price of wheat. Do we want to conserve wheat for human food? Then we ought to make the price so that the farmer will be able to feed corn or other grain instead of wheat to the hogs. If this price is raised, it will be in ample time to increase the acreage of the spring-wheat States. The same rule that is working in all the winter-wheat belt of the country, resulting in the plowing up of the wheat and the feeding of wheat to hogs, will decrease the acreage of wheat this spring in every spring-wheat section of our country; so that when we want a large yield we are going to cut down the yield away below normal. To my mind it is a fatal blunder. Regardless of theories and of everything else, we must pay the producer of foodstuffs a sufficient amount so that he can afford to produce.

Mr. President, I leave off as I began. If the producer does not produce, the consumer can not consume. The first essential of all is production. Conservation will not amount to anything when there is not enough food to go around to conserve. The idea that Congress had, I think, was the same that Mr. Hoover outlined when we passed the Food Administration act—that nothing should be done to take the profit away from production; that the operations of the Food Administration should be confined between the consumer and the producer, to see that from the time the food left the producer until it reached the consumer it was not unduly enhanced by monopoly or any unfair practice. But we are killing the goose that lays the golden egg when we make it unprofitable for the producer to produce the very thing that we all know we must have.

Food will win the war. We can not win the war without food. Therefore we should do everything and bend every effort to bring about the maximum amount of production. The producers are not in a monopoly. Nobody brings that charge. From the very nature of things they can not organize into a monopoly, and we ought not to repeal the law of supply and demand as to the producer of any product that is good for human food or that will sustain our armies or the armies of our allies.

Mr. President, to my mind it is a war necessity that we should take some step similar to the one proposed in regard to wheat. I think we ought to take it in regard to other things, perhaps. There ought to be something done in regard to the stock proposition, because nearly every hog producer and every man who feeds sheep and every man who feeds cattle in the United States to-day is losing money on every head. But, as I said, I am not going to discuss that now. It is a war necessity. If there ever was one, there is a war necessity before us now—increased production—and, regardless of disagreements that may have existed in the past, we must win this war at all hazards.

Before war was declared there was a disagreement. There were those who thought we ought to stay out. I was one of them. But when, by the legally constituted authority of our country, war was declared, it became my war as much as yours, and I do not want to see anything left undone that if done will bring victory to our armies. And, Mr. President, as the war progresses there are other things developing. The Civil War was commenced on the theory that the Federal Government would not permit a State to secede from the Union, and yet before that war was half fought out the real cause for its origin was forgotten, and even the ordinary citizen who looks back through the pages of history now does not think of its real cause, but remembers only that its result was the abolition of slavery. A race that had been held in bondage for centuries was made free, and that was the result, the outcome of that great catastrophe.

Mr. President, if the war in which we are now engaged, notwithstanding that we went into it for the announced purpose of protecting our citizens on the high seas, shall result in the disarmament of nations, in the abolition of secret treaties, and in the promulgation of the principle that no conquest of one people by another shall be recognized by civilization, and in the establishment of a court of international scope to settle international disputes in the future—in other words, in the death of militarism and in the establishment of a permanent peace—then the sacrifices made will not have been made in vain. Then there will be some recompense for the thousands, the countless thousands of American boys who must lie in nameless graves on a foreign soil across the sea. We must unite our people by seeing to it that the millions of our loyal citizens who bend their backs in honest toil to produce the food necessary to make this great victory for humanity sure and certain are fairly recompensed for their patriotic efforts. We must not only be united, but we must be united in a purpose to leave nothing undone that will bring victory to our efforts and that will establish for the generations that shall follow us a peace that will be enduring and everlasting.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I am favorable to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] providing $2.50 as a price for wheat at the local markets, and I shall therefore vote for his motion to suspend the rules in order that this provision may be in order as a part of this appropriation bill. I do this because I believe that it is only fair, just, and right to the farmer, and within the spirit of the legislation heretofore enacted, known as the food-control bill.

I desire briefly to refer to that act and its objects and purposes so far as the producer is concerned, and the treatment he was to receive under this legislation.

In section 14 it is provided:

That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat produced within the United States shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit.

Mr. President, the farmers of the country, and particularly in my State, of which I have the best knowledge, do not feel that in the administration of this law they have been fairly dealt with, for several reasons.

When this bill was before the Agricultural Committee, of which I am a member, three propositions were presented.

One pertained to the voluntary association under this act for the purpose of extending production and controlling prices, and leaving the price proposition largely to the economic law of supply and demand. No one objected to this.

The second proposition related to the minimum price. The farmer did not object to the fixing of a minimum price, as I understand, providing it was fixed at such a figure as would enable him to receive, within the spirit of this law, a reasonable profit—all that he has ever asked and all that he requires. This, it was argued, would increase production. The fixing of a minimum price was for the purpose of guaranteeing to the farmer a price sufficient to give him a reasonable profit, so that he would plant more wheat; and within the spirit of the law and this promise by legislation the farmers of Kansas responded in every particular to the requirements of the Government by sowing the maximum proportion of area, 10,000,000 acres, in wheat. But they met with considerable misfortune. On account of the lack of moisture and insufficient labor there were some 5,000,000 acres—one-half of the entire crop—that had to be plowed up and put into other production.

I have a report from the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, dated December 21, 1917, in which it is stated:

Farmers of Kansas, responding nobly to their country's call for maximum operations, devoted a larger area to crops this year than at any previous time in the State's history. The total acreage in field crops in Kansas in 1917 amounted to 22,252,920 acres, as against 21,861,985 acres in 1916 and 19,359,663 acres in 1915. In fact, the more than 22,000,000 acres reported this year does not represent in full the area actually seeded, for the reason that approximately 5,000,000 acres of land on which wheat failed were replanted to oats, corn, the sorghums, and other crops.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator, if I have understood him correctly—and I simply want to be sure that I have understood him—5,000,000 acres of the wheat which was sowed last fall has already been plowed up?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir; of the 10,000,000 acres.

Mr. REED. So that we will be that much short in the crop that is to come this year?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; this is a report on the 1917 crop, which, as I understand, includes the winter wheat.

The third proposition presented for our consideration in connection with the food bill was the fixing of a maximum price. The farmer objected to the fixing of a maximum price, as did everyone else, except as a last resort. Mr. Hoover himself testified that he did not contemplate fixing a maximum price; and in his statement before the committee, which has already been referred to by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], he said:

The second illusion is that there is price fixing by this bill. There is no provision for price fixing, and no such thing can be carried out under the bill. What we hope to do is to stabilize prices by various devices and to regulate the profits and speculation out of handling commodities.

He also stated in his testimony that the fixing of a maximum price had proved a failure wherever tried, and that it was only used as a last resort. Of course, if it is a last resort in this instance, I presume under his testimony it would be justified; but the farmers of Kansas do not think, and I believe they are right, that the situation is such at the present time as to demand it.

Mr. Hoover was asked the following question:

Senator NORRIS. Has the minimum price been successful there?—

That is, in Europe.

Mr. HOOVER. Yes; it has been used as an effective agent to stimulation.

Senator NORRIS. The maximum price has proved a failure?

Mr. HOOVER. The maximum price has proved a failure in all cases, except where the Government controlled enough of the commodity. * * * I might tell you why it fails. The establishment of a maximum price is, in itself, the result of a shortage of supply; otherwise we do not do it. You have less foodstuffs than will go around to the whole of the consumers' demand, and therefore you put on a maximum price.

But as to this, Mr. President, the farmers are not so particular, providing a price is fixed on other production, and particularly upon the things that the farmer is required to purchase. This is the complaint that he has made, and it is a justifiable one. He has demanded, and the bill which we have passed authorized, I think, the fixing of prices on agricultural implements and on the things he uses in bringing about production, and if this were done there would be no complaint. The farmer now feels that he has been unfairly and unjustly dealt with, and from the bill itself and from the representations made at the hearings when the bill was considered and written I feel that he is justified in making the complaint.

When the bill was before the Senate I voted for the fixing of a price on every article that the farmer was obliged to use in production. I am favorable to doing that now, and I think it should be done. I feel that with the high price of farming implements, the high price of labor, the high price of seed, and the insufficient labor, and all the conditions which have changed since the passage of this law, if $2 was reasonable when the bill was passed certainly $2.50 is not unreasonable now. This increase in price would give the farmer at last a chance to break even and would not necessarily increase the cost of flour to the consumer, for the profits of the middleman could be limited to prevent any rise in price to the consumer. For instance, the grain dealers, the millers, the wholesale dealers, and retailers could all be properly regulated and some of them cut out entirely, if necessary, to prevent any higher price to the consumer. In any event, it has been shown by figures to be only a fraction of a cent to a loaf of bread, and even if it had to be paid would be better than no loaf at all, which will be the result if the producer is required to operate at a loss. This he can not continue to do long, no matter how patriotic he is. The farmer is as patriotic as any other person, and by his great increased production, and much of it at a financial loss, he is doing as great a patriotic duty as can possibly be performed.

I desire to call attention to a few letters which represent the sentiment expressed in a large number of other letters received as illustrative of how the farmers feel about this matter. I have a letter, dated February 26, 1918, from a farmer of Norton, Kans., which says:

The people are dissatisfied about this food proposition—wheat $2 per bushel and the Government allowing millers to advance the price of flour so the merchants can sell it for $2.85 per sack, while a short time ago it was sold for $2.65 per sack. Bran was advanced from $1.65 to $1.90 per sack and wheat at the same price. All kinds of feed going up, and so soon as a few cases of eggs arrive, down goes the price of eggs. Why not fix the price of all commodities and food supplies on a fair basis to consumer and producer alike?

I have here a letter relative to the price of farm implements, dated March 2, 1918, from a representative in the State legislature from Hays, Kans., where the farmers passed resolutions asking Congress to increase the price of wheat. He states:

As the increased cost of production is very large, and will be larger yet by the increased cost of machinery and labor, the wheat in western Kansas last year was a total failure, and hundreds of our farmers had to pay $2.50 per bushel for their seed wheat without the cost of preparing the land.

As further evidence of the increased cost of machinery, headers that cost the farmers three years ago $125 are now quoted on our local market from $350 to $375.

I have here a statement from a farmer at Hartford, Kans., dated February 20, 1918, relative to the price of farm implements, as follows:

Implements and hardware have advanced over 100 per cent. This was told by a traveling salesman of a large hardware firm. I have bought a disk gang plow, and my local dealer charged me just $100. This is just $50 more than it was three years ago. I asked one of our hardware dealers what they will sell twine for, and he told me that it would sell right around 22 cents per pound, and everything is in proportion.

In this connection I desire to call attention to the testimony of Mr. Simpson before the Agricultural Committee, given on February 16 last. Mr. John A. Simpson, president of the Farmers' Union of Oklahoma, Weatherford, Okla., states:

When I came down here at wheat-pricing time I looked up all my old receipts for machinery that I bought when I moved to Oklahoma. I paid $55 for my wagon and got two spring seats with it, because that was going to be my buggy as well as wagon. I went and priced the same thing 15 minutes before I took the train to Washington at wheat-pricing time, and that wagon then would have cost me $135. My drill cost me $50; it was then $165. A lister that I bought for $40 was then $105. The barbed wire that went around my place that I paid $2.10 for—and it had gone up just before I bought it—is now $8. There were some other articles, but those are enough.

Mr. President, these are some of the reasons why I feel that the price, in all fairness and justice to the farmers, if we are going to fix a price, should be at least $2.50 per bushel, as provided in the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. The testimony before the Agricultural Committee shows that $2.75 would be about the fair market value under all existing conditions. I introduced an amendment fixing the price at $2.65, but the committee seemed unwilling to report a bill for a higher price than $2.50, and I shall therefore content myself by voting for this as the best we can do.

The War Department recognizes the importance of agriculture in connection with the winning of the war, and in the drafting of the soldiers, as is shown in the latest order made by the Provost Marshal General, on the 12th of March, 1918, pertaining to this subject, I wish to read the following:

There are difficulties confronting the Nation in the supply of labor appurtenant to agriculture. Class I, from which new levies are to be withdrawn, will contain many more men than are at present required for the Army. It would be a most unscientific and fatuous step if the men in Class I were called indiscriminately, without regard to the labor situation in agriculture. Therefore the local boards will be directed to fill their quotas in the order of liability of men in Class I as determined by the national drawing, except that where it is shown that a registrant is completely and assiduously engaged in the planting, cultivation, or reaping of a crop his call to the colors shall be deferred to the foot of the quota of his board as long as he continues to be so engaged.

As to further means to protect agriculture a new regulation has been promulgated authorizing agricultural students in their senior year in land-grant colleges to enlist in the Enlisted Reserve Corps of the Quartermaster Department, provided their class standing is such as to place them in the upper third of their class. By this means it will be possible to defer the draft call of such young men in order to enable them to perfect themselves as agriculturists and thereafter to protect them in such services as it may seem that they should perform in the best interests of the Nation.

The whole industrial and agricultural situation is being subjected to very comprehensive study in order to discover any means that may be taken to protect and augment the labor supply appurtenant to industry and agriculture without precluding the prompt and orderly progress of our military plans. It is confidently believed that great progress can be made along this line and that more effective measures than any yet devised can be put into operation to attain the desired end.

There are other references to the farmer in the order, which I shall ask to be made a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

There are difficulties confronting the Nation in the supply of labor appurtenant to agriculture. Class I, from which new levies are to be withdrawn, will contain many more men than are at present required for the Army. It would be a most unscientific and fatuous step if the men in Class I were called indiscriminately, without regard to the labor situation in agriculture. Therefore the local boards will be directed to fill their quotas in the order of liability of men in Class I as determined by the national drawing, except that where it is shown that a registrant is completely and assiduously engaged in the planting, cultivation, or reaping of a crop his call to the colors shall be deferred to the foot of the quota of his board as long as he continues to be so engaged. Whenever any registrant whose call to the colors has been deferred by reason of his engagement in agriculture is shown to have been idle on the farm on which he is engaged or to have trifled with the deferment that has been accorded him, the boards will forthwith induct him into military service if his order number has been reached in the meantime. The effect of this expedient is to grant furloughs from service prior to actual call to the colors to the men so greatly needed in the production of this year's crop.

This is not, however, the only expedient that is to be adopted to conserve the supply of labor appurtenant to agriculture and to mobilize all means for increasing the harvest for the agricultural season of 1918.

There is now pending before Congress a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to grant furloughs, with or without pay, to men in the Army to enable them to engage in industrial and agricultural pursuits. The purpose of this bill is to relieve serious situations in particular instances in which men who are the mainstays of farms have been inducted into the service either through voluntary enlistment or selection, and whose services during the present emergency in agriculture are needed. These furloughs will be granted after consideration of the circumstances of the individual case in which they arise and when the military situation is such that they can be granted without too great disruption and disorganization of the Army or of any particular organization of the Army.

As to further means to protect agriculture, a new regulation has been promulgated authorizing agricultural students in their senior year in land-grant colleges to enlist in the Enlisted Reserve Corps of the Quartermaster's Department, provided their class standing is such as to place them in the upper third of their class. By this means it will be possible to defer the draft call of such young men in order to enable them to perfect themselves as agriculturalists, and thereafter to protect them in such services as it may seem that they should perform in the best interests of the Nation.

The whole industrial and agricultural situation is being subjected to very comprehensive study, in order to discover any means that may be taken to protect and augment the labor supply appurtenant to industry and agriculture, without precluding the prompt and orderly progress of our military plans. It is confidently believed that great progress can be made along this line, and that more effective measures than any yet devised can be put into operation to attain the desired end.

To sum up, it may be said that there will be no sudden withdrawal of great numbers of men from the ranks of industry and agriculture during the coming summer, but that men will be drawn in relatively small groups throughout the year in such a way as to create the least possible interference with industry and agriculture. Men in deferred classes, as well as men in Class I, will be selected in small numbers, either on account of their special technical qualifications or for the purpose of sending them to schools where they will be given an opportunity to acquire such qualifications.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, there are three things essential to the winning of this war—the men, the money, and the food. We have already demonstrated that we have the men—volunteers 10,000,000 strong under the selective-draft system. We have already demonstrated that we have the money, the last Congress appropriating something over $20,000,000,000, the greater portion of it going to the prosecution of the war. The people have generally all over the country responded freely to every liberty-loan call, the subscriptions so far being more than the amount required by the Government, and I believe that will be the result of the third call and of every call necessary to be made. The people have responded liberally and willingly to the Red Cross, contributing over $100,000,000 in cash, and to every financial call necessary to the winning of the war.

The next and most important proposition is food, for without food it is conceded by all that the war will be a failure; for we must provide food not only for the people at home, but for our soldiers at the front as well as our allies and our allies' soldiers, and in order to do this we must have the production. The farmer of this country is producer of the things required for food at home and required for the sustenance of the Army, and he certainly in this emergency is entitled to at least fair treatment, which is all that he has ever asked. He is not objecting to fixing a price provided the price upon the things which he is obliged to use in order to produce the food is also fixed, even to the extent of a maximum price. And he does not object to the minimum price, and did not at the time of the passage of the act, if it assured him a reasonable profit, as indicated in the language of the bill itself and as fairly contemplated by the act.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to suspend the rules in order that we may make this measure a part of this appropriation bill and have it enacted into law now. If that fails simply on account of a two-thirds vote, which has been held necessary in order to suspend the rules, we shall then have to introduce some other measure or proceed in some other way in order to secure that justice and fairness for the farmer which he is entitled to in the present emergency. The farmer knows no eight-hour day, but works hard from before daylight in the morning until long after dark at night. He is making every sacrifice possible to aid in the war. He is buying liberty bonds, savings stamps, and contributing to the Red Cross. He is giving up his sons to go to the front, and in many cases the women of the household are taking their places. No greater patriots can be found among our citizens. Let the Government, which demands and accepts so much from the farmer, give him at least what it promised him by law—a reasonable profit on the things he produces.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, much argument has been given in the course of this discussion in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. Letters have been read from farmers and grain dealers in the great wheat-growing States of the country showing the need of legislation that will stimulate the production of wheat. But, Mr. President, I clipped from the Washington Post of this morning an editorial inspired by the address of M. Andre Tardieu, the French high commissioner, delivered at Baltimore last night. It portrays the conditions in France. It shows the need not only of the civilians of France, but the soldiers of France themselves, who are now being rationed from the food products of America, and the principal one, of course, is wheat.

I send this editorial to the desk, with the request that it may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, March 19, 1918.]

FOOD CONDITIONS IN FRANCE.

In his address at Baltimore last night, M. Andre Tardieu, French high commissioner, revealed many important facts which Americans should know. Whether the enemy is comforted by these facts or not, it is absolutely necessary that the people of the United States should not deceive themselves as to conditions in France. The first step toward giving effective aid is to know that aid is imperatively needed.

France has always been a heavy consumer of wheat. The consumption before the war was about 700,000 tons per month. It has now been cut to about 530,000 tons, a reduction of about 25 per cent. The ration of soldiers at the front has actually been cut down, although the heaviest cut has been made, of course, in the civilian ration. The French soldier now gets 21 ounces of bread instead of the 25 ounces he received at the beginning of the year. The civilian ration has been cut from the normal consumption of about 30 ounces to only 10 ounces.

In order to make even these rations available, France has been compelled to stop brewing in order to save barley, and to stop feeding of cereals to animals. This has resulted in a loss of 50 per cent of the horses and a large reduction in the number of cattle. Pastry making, fancy bread, confectionery, sandwiches, and all fancy uses of cereals have been absolutely suppressed.

Because of the shortage of cereals the French people have been compelled to kill off their cattle, and this has forced the consumption of meat instead of wheat to a large extent. In the meantime the consumption of other foods, such as sugar, rice, vegetables, oils, and fats has been reduced by dire necessity.

This drastic food regime has been borne with fortitude by the French people at a time when they have mobilized 7,000,000 men out of a population of 35,000,000, and have suffered the loss of nearly 1,000,000 men killed and 1,000,000 maimed.

Do Americans realize the full force of this information from the French commissioner? Do the citizens of this country individually feel that they are doing everything that in their duty lies to aid the lion-hearted ally that now holds two-thirds of the western front? Is each American thinking of the help that he might be giving to some heroic French soldier at the front, or an equally heroic French woman doing a man's work in France?

France needs no cargoes of faith or courage from the New World. She needs no messages telling her to do her duty. She is not in need of sermons on patriotism. But she does need food. If Americans are heart and soul in this war they will not see the army and people of France go hungry while there is food in the United States to share with them.

There must be fresh efforts in producing, saving, and transporting food to France. Americans must strive to picture the real conditions. They must sweep aside imaginary visions of easy victories over an intimidated and broken-down foe, and face the brutal fact that America and France, with their allies, are fighting for life against a terrible enemy. France is on the burning line, side by side with the British nation, fighting with dauntless courage. American soldiers are joining them in rapidly increasing numbers. All of these fighters must be fed and equipped. The civilian populations that supply the armies must be fed.

The United States is not doing its full duty in the production and delivery of food to the allies. More acres should be planted and more strict methods of saving should be adopted forthwith. By the convoy system fewer vessels laden with food are lost than heretofore, which is a most encouraging factor. There is fair assurance that every vessel carrying food will arrive in France or England.

There must be more vessels carrying food. It is the vital necessity of the situation, the trumpet call to every individual citizen of the United States. Every person can help, either by planting or by saving. Not to help is to incur terrible risk now and hereafter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, if I understand the situation correctly, the President, under the authority given him by the food-control act has already fixed the price of wheat for this year's crop at $2.20, continuing last year's price for standard wheat at Chicago, with perhaps some changes in differentials as between Chicago and other points.

In his proclamation fixing the price of wheat this year the President said:

To increase the price of wheat above the present figure, or to agitate any increase of price, would have the effect of very seriously hampering the large operations of the Nation and of the allies by causing the wheat of last year's crop to be withheld from the market.

It would, moreover, dislocate all the present wage levels that have been established after much anxious discussion and would therefore create an industrial unrest which would be harmful to every industry of the country.

The President said in this proclamation that the price of $2.20 would assure the farmer a reasonable profit, even if the war should end within the year.

Mr. President, that is sufficient for me. I would not knowingly vote for any measure that would hamper the operations of this Nation or of the allies in connection with the war.

I shall therefore vote against the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is with a good deal of reluctance that I shall take any time of the Senate at all, especially to discuss the question of wheat. It is pretty well known that I have a personal interest in the growing of wheat. It is pretty well known that I farm on a rather large scale. For that reason I dislike to discuss the question.

But, Mr. President, I think it can be truthfully said that at no time in the history of our country have the producers been able to combine, and at no time have they been able to fix the price of wheat or of any other of the products which they grow. So I regard it as somewhat different from an industry that can be controlled by a combination of a few men. There are in this country, as we know, some 7,000,000 farms and farmers. There are in this country some 40,000,000 people depending upon this great industry.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will pardon me for alluding to myself, but I said on the floor of the Senate nearly a year ago that if the Government of the United States wanted my farm during the period of the war it would be welcome to it. I said then that all I would ask in return would be that the Government should pay the taxes during the time it might operate the farm.

Were it not for the fact that the question of food is as important as is the question of munitions, and almost as important as is the question of men, I might not take the time of the Senate for a single moment to discuss this subject. I am going to eliminate the question of whether or not the farmer of the United States has made a profit during this last year. Let us eliminate that; let us say, for the sake of the argument, that he has made a profit, which would not apply to many of the States. It would not apply to the spring-wheat States—at least not for the year 1917.

It may be said that the result may be due to a partial failure of the crop in the spring-wheat States, but the average production for the five years previous to the war, however, was about 233,500,000 bushels of spring wheat, and we produced last year 232,758,000 bushels. The shortage was not so great in the spring wheat as it was in the winter wheat.

This is an important problem, and I feel that we ought to do everything in our power in order to induce the farmers of the country to plant as much wheat as practicable, so as to produce as much food as possible.

Mr. President, the press of the country realizes the importance of raising food. I shall read only one sentence from an editorial appearing in the Washington Post, dated February 27, 1918, under the heading of "Increased food production necessary." I read as follows:

It is a serious question whether the United States Government is not neglecting one of the most important precautions that could be taken by a nation at war—the adequate production of food.

Mr. President, the producers in this country can not afford, of course, to have it said that they are refusing to produce food; the farmers of the country can not afford to have it said that they are unpatriotic; that they will not produce wheat and other foods, because there is no profit connected with their production. The people of my own State showed their patriotism in that respect last year. Last year we increased our acreage by more than 2,000,000 acres. We had an acreage of all cereals of nearly 15,000,000 acres. We sowed to wheat during last year more than 2,000,000 acres above what we devoted to that crop the year before; and yet, due to climatic conditions, we raised but a small crop. Our average yield of wheat was not to exceed 6 or 7 bushels per acre for the entire State. While we ought to have produced 160,000,000 bushels of wheat, we produced less than 60,000,000 bushels. That can not be said to have been the fault of the farmer, because he did increase his acreage. He borrowed money very extensively; he went to large expense in harvesting his crop, which, in many instances, would not have been harvested, would not have been garnered if it had not been for the fact that those farmers considered that the food question was an important one and that they must conserve every bushel of grain, whether it paid them to do so or not.

These are questions, Senators, which you and I must consider. It is undoubtedly true that in some of the States—perhaps in many States—where the farmers produced a large crop of wheat they made a profit, but I repeat, that it is not true that the farmers made a profit, so far as the spring-wheat States are concerned. I see before me the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and I want to read what a distinguished gentleman from his State said with regard to price fixing. I read from pages 76 and 77 of the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for June, 1917.

He was ask by Representative MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan why he did not discuss price fixing, and I will give you his reply:

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. I regret that you did not discuss the price-fixing proposition. We appreciate to some extent, but not as fully as you do, perhaps, the labor problem and the other difficulties confronting the farmers, but it may be up to us to do some legislating on the question of price fixing or to enact some regulatory measure in that regard, and I was hoping that you would give us your opinion.

Dr. THOMPSON. We recognize the seriousness of the situation. I think we all agree that the time has not yet arrived when we should fix prices for farm products.

That is the testimony of the eminent educator from the great State of Ohio. There are many other statements here which bear upon this subject which I might read, but I shall not now take the time of the Senate to do so.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say that the testimony which he read was given in June, 1917?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir. It was given in June, 1917.

I desire to say further, Mr. President, that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has held extended hearings, lasting for five or six weeks, and yet not one of the witnesses who have appeared before that committee has advocated the fixing of prices of any of the food products. I have in mind now the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Wallace, the editor of the Wallace Farmer, who is regarded as a great authority upon the subject of agriculture. When he was asked the question the other day if he believed in price fixing, he said, "Absolutely no."

He made the further statement—I shall not attempt to quote him verbatim now, although what I stated a moment ago was exactly his language—that last summer when the food bill was before the Senate he wrote the Senators from Iowa that he thought $2 for wheat was too high, but, he says, "I have revised my opinion; I know now that I was absolutely wrong." That is the statement of Mr. Wallace.

I wish to read from the testimony of a distinguished gentleman from the city of Minneapolis, whom the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] knows better than I do. I refer to Mr. H. N. Owen, who is publisher of an agricultural paper, I believe, in the city of Minneapolis. Mr. President, I ask leave to print some of the testimony, as I do not wish to take time of the Senate to read it all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Owen says:

Of course, you argue that a farmer should be perfectly satisfied with $2.20 wheat, because it is so much more than he ever got before. Theoretically he should be, but, unfortunately for that argument, the farmer is not operating on a large surplus. He has not a great big surplus in the bank that he can afford to do business on for patriotic motives for two or three years. Here are just a few figures. They are taken from the 1916 Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture. We find that in Montana 50.9 per cent of the farms are mortgaged, and that the average mortgage is $2,943; in North Dakota we find that 46.3 per cent of the farms are mortgaged, and the average mortgage is $1,864; in South Dakota the farms mortgaged number about 38.2 per cent, with an average of $2,897 per mortgage; in Minnesota 21.1 per cent of the farms are mortgaged, and the average mortgage is $2,612.

We find for those four spring-wheat States 49.1 per cent of the farms are mortgaged. Then, on top of that, we find the average rented farms for those States is 18½ per cent. That makes 67.6 per cent of our farms are either rented or mortgaged, so that we practically have only 32.4 per cent of our farmers as free agents. The man who has got a mortgage, got interest to meet of $100 or $150, as the case may be, or if he is on a rented farm, has got to do as the owner says.

Mr. President, I think it is important to show the actual condition of the farmers. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] yesterday asked some questions with reference to the prosperity of the farmers. I know that the farmers of the United States have no better friend than the Senator from New Hampshire, and I know that he would be the last man on earth to do an injustice either to the farmers or to any other body of citizens engaged in industry, but there has been so much confusion and there is so much ignorance about the condition of the farmers that I am not surprised at all that they are not getting justice.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if a good many of these mortgages do not grow out of the fact that when the ambitious farmer in the great agricultural States gets a quarter section of land paid for he wants another quarter section, and he is not fully satisfied until he gets a full section of 640 acres, and, as he adds to his farm, of course he mortgages it to a greater or less extent? I will ask the Senator if that is not a very common occurrence?

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President, I want to say that in some instances the reason the farmer has mortgaged his land is that he buys more land. There are perhaps many such instances. When a farmer is prosperous and is able to pay off the mortgage on the land he owns he may buy more; but I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire—and I say it with a fair knowledge of the situation—that I think the farmers in my State—and I think my colleague will corroborate my statement—know that it does not pay to farm on a large scale. Instead of the farms growing larger, in many instances they are growing smaller, and they would be much smaller than they are to-day were it not for the fact that immigration has been stopped, that capital has not flowed into our State as it should, and that many of our people have gone across the border into Canada. Some 200,000 people have gone from this country into Canada in order to get free homes.

That of itself shows that those farmers were not prosperous, because the farmer, like every other American citizen, loves his home, and he will not abandon it if it is possible for him to make a decent living. He will remain on the farm.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McCUMBER. If my colleague will allow me, I think there are wrong impressions concerning the mortgages and also concerning the dealing especially in the Northwest, which ought to be corrected.

I have heard the reports which my colleague read, from the Agricultural Department, I assume, showing the percentage of mortgages upon farms; and the Senator from New Hampshire asked if these mortgages are not due to purchases of additional land. In the first instance, let me say that these mortgages as given by the Agricultural Department do not represent anywhere near the amount of indebtedness against the farm. My colleague will agree with me that in the State of North Dakota nearly all lands are sold to the farmer under what is called a crop-contract sale. If you sell a quarter section of land for $5,000, the owner of the land may hold it clear, and there is no mortgage of record against it; and yet the farmer will not own it until he has paid, generally by giving a percentage of the crops each year. He is just as much indebted in that way as though it had been a trust deed, and just as much as though it had been a mortgage. It represents an indebtedness against the land, and yet that does not appear in the reports. In the case of most of this land that is sold, as I suggested, instead of being represented by mortgages, when a farmer in my State buys an additional quarter section he enters into a contract whereby the title will not pass to him until he has paid whatever indebtedness there is against it; and that does not appear of record.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank my colleague for calling my attention to that. It is true, as he has stated, that there are thousands and thousands of cases where that is being done; and while there is more indebtedness, it is not a matter of record, because the farmer or the man who buys the farm does not get a deed to it. He gets a contract, as my colleague has stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for his suggestion that I would be one of the last men to take action that would be harmful to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. GRONNA. Or any other.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or any other. I thank the Senator again, and that is precisely my attitude on this question; but I regret to have it represented that the farmer is in sad straits in these great agricultural States.

The Senator has repeated what has been said so often before, that the farmers have left Iowa and the Dakotas and perhaps Minnesota and gone over to Canada because they could do better. Now, there is a reason for that. They had taken up land in Iowa, as an illustration, at $1.25 an acre. It had come to be worth $100 or $150 an acre. There was virgin land in Saskatchewan and Alberta, in western Canada, that could be bought for $8 or $10 an acre, equally as good land, and they went over there as the Yankee goes from New England to the West, to better his condition. I think that explains to a very large extent why farmers from those great States are going into Canada.

Again, I recall the time when the savings banks of New Hampshire held thousands of mortgages on the farms in the great agricultural States of the Northwest. There was a panic, and very large losses were sustained by our banks. They, however, had been loaning money at an inordinate rate of interest, and we did not so much sympathize with them because of those losses. But time went on, and those mortgages were canceled to a very large extent, and I think the loans now are trifling in the matter of mortgages on Western lands. It was said at this time, when prosperity returned to the agricultural interests of those States, that they were sending their money even to the eastern banks; they had so much money that they did not know what to do with it; their own banks were filled with money. That was heralded all over this country as an illustration of the great prosperity of the farmers, and I believe it, and I hope now that it was true.

Of course there are many farmers who are in distress, as there are many people of every other vocation in life, but I still believe that the farmers are more prosperous than has been represented by Senators on this floor; and yet the testimony of the Senator from North Dakota, himself interested in agriculture, would have great weight with me.

I assure the Senator that whatever action I take, whatever vote I may cast, will be a conscientious vote; and if I can bring myself conscientiously to vote with the Senator on any proposition I certainly shall do it, because I do not want to do any harm to the agricultural interests of our country, especially at the present time, when the morning paper calls in a loud voice for more food for France; and I presume that is true of all the warring nations.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, whatever may be the action of the Senator from New Hampshire, I know he will be actuated purely by patriotic motives, and I shall accept the result as it may come.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the mention by the Senator from New Hampshire of the prosperity of the farmer calls my attention to what the Senator from North Dakota heard this morning at the hearing before the Agricultural Committee in regard to the profits made and allowed under the regulation of the Food Administration to the great packing institutions of the country, which was a profit of 9 per cent on all of their investment, no matter where it was from, and without any question about it, and 15 per cent on all their investment in the by-products. The Senator remembers that in reaching a conclusion as to the profits, everyone connected with the business who did anything in regard to any of the packing establishments drew a salary. Every item was counted in, and then the dividend was allowed on the total; so, if no dividend had been allowed, the men who own it, if they had done the work as the farmer does, would have been getting a good salary.

I want to ask the Senator if he knows of a single instance in a single year where any farmer anywhere in the United States in the most prosperous days, if he had been allowed a salary for himself and all his family and everybody who worked, and interest on all the value of his farm machinery and everything connected with the business, would have had such a thing as a return. While, speaking in a general way, the prosperity of the farmer has been as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, yet we are so apt to fail to consider—we always do, I think—that in bringing about that prosperity there never is an item allowed for the farmer's salary, the salary of his wife and his children; there is no percentage basis of any kind allowed on his investment. So that while he is prosperous, he brings about that prosperity by his own labor and the labor of his family. If they were paid a salary, there would not be anything left with which to declare a dividend on the value of the property.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Nebraska says. My colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] and I have so often explained that on the floor of the Senate that I do not think it is necessary for me to amplify it. I want to say, however, that we had Mr. Cotton before our Committee on Agriculture and Forestry this morning, and he stated that the method of dealing with the packers was this: Allow the packer 9 per cent on all the money that may be used in his business. Now, remember that that is not simply on the capital stock and the surplus, but 9 per cent upon the amount of money that may be borrowed. One of these concerns has a capitalization of one hundred and fifty millions. I presume it borrows into the billions. Yet, Mr. President, under this admission and under his own statement, they are allowed a profit not alone upon the capitalization, upon the bonds, and upon the surplus that this corporation may have, but they are allowed to figure a profit upon all the money borrowed. That was Mr. Cotton's statement. Oh, Mr. President, if the farmers of the country were dealt with as generously as that, do you think a single Senator on this floor would take the time of the Senate to delay these proceedings and to demand legislation that might encourage the farmers to produce?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. If the farmers were allowed such profits they would not ask any Senator to help them.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator. That is what I intended to say—that in that event the farmers would never think of such a thing as asking any Senator to ask for any legislation that might be helpful or beneficial to them. We have had farmers before the committee who have stated: "You allow us 6 per cent and we will be glad to turn our farms over to you, and, besides, we will work for the Government without any pay."

My colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] has often called attention to the fact that the farmer and his family are never allowed any wages. My colleague has called attention to the fact that if the farmer can pay his obligations, pay interest on his debts, pay his taxes, and then have a little left, regardless of whether he is paid any wages or not, he is satisfied, and he ought to be satisfied during the period of the war. There is no reason why the farmer should make any more money during the war than he did before the war, and he should not complain, providing all the industries are treated alike. It would be just as unpatriotic, I say, for the farmers of the United States to ask for a larger profit during this war as it is for men engaged in other industries. But, Mr. President, touching upon that question, we made the mistake of our lives when we enacted the revenue law. When we had the taxing bill before us I said that I had no objection to letting people in the various industries make profits. I have none now; and if the farmers make unduly large profits, let us amend the law and increase the rates on the farmer who makes excessive profits and also increase the rates of the profiteers who are engaged in the manufacturing industries. If the farmers are profiteers, let us take the excessive profits away from them by taxation to help carry on this war. That is the only sound system. I am not asking for a special privilege for the farmer. But when I think of the hundreds of thousands of boys who have crossed the ocean, who are over in France, or the boys who are still here and are ready to go on the field of battle, these young men who have signified a willingness to sacrifice their all in defense of their country, and who are not asking for any profits—when I think of those boys and think of the possibility that we shall be unable to supply a sufficient amount of food for them, I feel that we are shirking our responsibilities. I want to say to you, Senators, this is a serious proposition. It is at least a question which deserves the most careful consideration by us here.

There is no question in my mind but that the farmers will produce. There ought not to be any question about it. So, speaking for the State which I in part have the honor to represent, I know that the farmers are willing to produce, but they feel that they are entitled to the same treatment as those engaged in other industries. In some portions of my State the crops last year were almost a failure, but in spite of that the farmers had enough interest in our country and in the boys who have gone to the front to try the experiment another year. And although many have to ask the State to help them out with seed wheat, because they did not raise enough for seed and feed for another year, this, I think, will answer the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire as to whether all our farmers are prosperous or not.

I hold in my hand a document entitled "Seed and feed bonding act. House bill No. 1, passed by the special session of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of North Dakota, January 29, 1918." That, I think, answers the Senator's question. The legislature was called together for the purpose of enacting a law enabling counties to bond themselves and furnish seed and feed to the farmers. That was a patriotic purpose.

We have heard a great deal said about legislation in the other House, asking for an appropriation of $50,000,000 to furnish the farmers of the country with seed and feed. I understand that that measure was not favorably considered. Another bill is now pending before that body providing for seven and one-half million dollars for this same purpose and two and one-half million dollars to provide for the transportation of what is called migratory labor, and labor is a very serious question with the farmer. I am not going to enter into it. I could, if I wanted to, have a good deal to say on that subject, but I shall not do so now.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. If my colleague will allow me, I should like to interpose a suggestion right here in response to a statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] yesterday, I think, in which he said that grain was very high in his State; that the farmers who had to buy grain and feed for chickens could not buy it; and that they were compelled to sell off their chickens, which would naturally create a dearth of eggs and poultry next year, but at the same time they had any quantity of hay, which they could not dispose of. He should have added to that that the farmers in eastern Montana and western North Dakota last year, on account of the drought and no hay and feed, were compelled to ship the calves and lambs and everything else they produced in the shape of food animals, because they did not have the hay to feed them and did not have the feed for them. I know there was an order made by the railway passing through our State that no cattle could be shipped within a given length of time whatever. They refused to take them. Why? Because they said, "Montana is worse off than you are; the Montana farmers have got to get their cattle to market immediately or they will starve." So we could not ship any and were compelled to wait until they could get rid of the cattle that were for sale in Montana, where the farmers had nothing to feed them. The Senator will see that we are just as badly off in the western part of our State and in eastern Montana, where we raise cattle, as he is in New Hampshire, where the farmers can not get feed for their chickens.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank my colleague. What he has stated is absolutely true. I want to add to what he has said that much immature stock was shipped out of the State because there was a scarcity of feed, both hay and grain. There were hundreds of thousands of immature animals shipped to the stockyards which never ought to have been shipped out, due to the fact that there was a shortage of feed and grain.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator leaves that subject, I should like to have his views on an order of the Food Department prohibiting the sale of hens for a while this spring. I have many inquiries and communications from housewives in my part of the country. They are unable to sell their hens without any regard to whether they are now producers or merely consumers and cumberers of the barnyard. A laying hen, I admit, ought to be conserved, but what about the one that has passed that period or has never been productive? That order has no discriminating features in it; it gets them all.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I confess that I can not go into the mysteries of the question propounded by the Senator from Illinois. It is possible, and I think it is true, that Mr. Hoover has made mistakes. I think he has made some very serious mistakes, not intentionally, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he has not made any mistakes in expending money. That has been a great success.

Mr. GRONNA. It is very true that he has caused the expenditure of a large amount of money, but I was not going into that at this time. However, since my distinguished friend from Illinois has called attention to it, I can only say to him what a friend of mine said to me some years ago. He was a man who would occasionally buy wheat or grain off the board of trade. It seems that he had been unfortunate, and instead of making profits he had made a loss. In a crowd of young men I asked him if he did not at one time try his luck on the board of trade. He came over to me and whispered to me: "I thought you were a friend of mine and that you were going to help me forget it." [Laughter.] I am going to try to help the Senator from Illinois to forget some of these unpleasant experiences if I can.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just a word more——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield gladly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did call attention to the very circumstance that the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has alluded to, and it is a fact. The cost of grain to the people of New England, where they do not raise much, is at the present time a very great burden, and it was very natural that I should interpose the suggestion at least that by increasing the price of wheat it would increase the price of flour to the consumers of the East. That is true.

Now, as to hay, we have done our best in New England to teach the automobile to eat hay, and it will not do it. The result is that we have had a very large crop the past two years, and our barns are groaning with hay that is not salable. But the farmer is trying to be philosophical notwithstanding that fact, and some time he may get a market for hay, because there may be a shortage of the crop this year or next year or some other year, just as there has been a shortage of wheat in certain years.

The banks of New England are loaning the farmers money at 5 per cent, and hence we have no use for the new institution that has been created to loan money to farmers. Not a bond of that institution has been purchased in the State of New Hampshire, and I think the example that the banks of New Hampshire has set in that respect of loaning money to farmers at 5 per cent might well be copied by the banks of the West that are loaning money to the farmers at a higher rate of interest.

We are trying all we can to encourage agriculture. We can not raise corn to much advantage; we can not raise wheat to much advantage. We might raise some oats and some barley in New England, but we are dependent upon the great agricultural States of the West for our grain and for our flour almost exclusively. I know a good many years ago I made a little investigation and found that six little New England States consumed between five and six million dollars' worth of flour, most of which came from the great State of Minnesota.

Of course, we have to look out for our own interests, as the great West has to look out for its interests. I have a great deal of sympathy with the view that has been suggested by the two Senators from North Dakota, that the farmer does not get wages, and his wife does not get wages, and, as a rule, his children do not get wages; in other words, there are no overhead charges on the farm as there are in manufacturing establishments.

I am very glad indeed to be instructed by these Senators and to get a broader vision of this question than I entertained a little while ago, because it was thoroughly well understood in the East not many years ago that the West did not need any money from the East to invest in farm mortgages as they used to do; that their banks were full of money, and it was being sent to the eastern banks to be taken care of. Likely that is a very great exaggeration. I have no question but the farmer is struggling for his living as every other class is struggling for a living, and we ought not to do anything, and I ought not to say anything, that would in any way lead to the conclusion that I was antagonizing the efforts that are being made to produce more wheat in this country, because I think it is a very important matter, and it may be almost a deciding matter in the conduct of the war sooner or later.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, there is no disagreement between the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire and myself. I know that conditions are somewhat different in the East from what they are in the West, but the fundamental principle of production is the same. The fact that the United States ought to produce not only enough food for itself but for the allies, I think, is not a mooted question at this time. I think we all realize the necessity of producing not only enough for our own people but for the people who are allied with us in this war.

Now, Mr. President, if I may be permitted to read from Mr. Owen's testimony—Mr. Owen states:

> The farmer is just as patriotic as anybody; he is willing to go the limit, and he is uncomplaining. But he does not like to be asked to grow wheat without a profit and then be damned because he does not buy liberty loan bonds when they come around to make the drive, when, in point of fact, he may have made sacrifices for the good of the country that means more to him than the $50,000 bond subscription does to a man of the $50,000 kind.
> The cost of production has gone up very materially. Let us just take the items of machinery.

I want the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to hear this because I know he is very much interested in it—

> I have these prices from a town in the Red River Valley, in the northern part of Minnesota.

This is the testimony of Mr. Owen:

> I think they would be a fair reflection of what the farmer in our big wheat-growing country must pay, compared to 1914. In 1914 a 7-foot self-binder retailed for $150. In 1917 that binder retailed for $185 and in 1918 for $250. A 20 double-disk drill was $130 in 1914 and $145 in 1917, and this year it costs $200. A 14-inch gang plow was $65 in 1914, $85 in 1917, and now it is $140. A lumber wagon, complete, just the ordinary farm wagon, cost in 1914, $75; in 1917 it cost $95; and in 1918 it cost $150. You see the jump from 1915 to 1918 has been enormous. Binding twine has gone up from 9 cents in 1914 to 20 cents in 1917 and 26 cents in 1918. Harness is up about 200 per cent.

Mr. President, that seems to me to tell the story. Is it possible, I ask, to hold the farmer down and to restrict his price, willing though he may be, patriotic as he is? How long I ask you will he be able to go on and produce. There is not one farmer out of fifty who does not borrow money from the bank during his farming operations. How long will the bank be able, I ask you, to go on and extend credit to the farmer, willing though he may be from patriotic purposes and no other to go on and produce? It is exactly as I said here last year. It is not a question of willingness, it is not a question of patriotism, it is a question of being able to do it.

Mr. President, I do not feel that I hold any brief for farmers any more than any other Member of this body, but I know their condition; I know their difficulties; I know the farm is their home and they love it as much as the people in the cities love their homes. They will not stop producing things that they possibly can produce, and with their sons in a foreign land willing to die for this country, willing to die for democracy, for liberty, and freedom, do not think that the farmers are unwilling to go on and produce. They are not.

Mr. President, I want to read an excerpt from a letter from Col. C. H. March, vice chairman of the Minnesota Commission of Public Safety. We have in North Dakota a farmers' organization known as the Nonpartisan League. The membership of this organization is composed of farmers. I know that the farmers of North Dakota are patriotic and loyal, and so far as it has reference to the farmers, I want to say from my own personal knowledge that this association has been scandalously misrepresented as to its patriotism and loyalty. I have been among them since I was a boy, and I know that they are patriotic. However, this letter comes from a man who is not a member of that organization, but one who I understand has strenously opposed it in the State of Minnesota, so I suppose it is safe to quote him. I have met Col. March but once. I understand he is a splendid citizen and his patriotism and loyalty are not questioned. Of course, they have only good citizens in the State of Minnesota, the same as we have in North Dakota. Here is what Mr. March says. He writes this letter from Litchfield, Minn., under date of February 16, 1918, addressed to myself:

> MINNESOTA COMMISSION OF PUBLIC SAFETY,
> Litchfield, Minn., February 16, 1918.
> Hon. Senator GRONNA,
> MY DEAR SENATOR: I arrived home yesterday and find the farmers of this State aroused over the present wheat prices and prices of other grains. I also found a number of letters on my desk from different parts of the State saying that the farmers would not sow wheat unless the price was higher. That would be a very foolish thing to do from a patriotic standpoint of view. I trust the bill for grading and fixing a higher price will be passed very soon, as it means a great deal to our country at this time.
> Sincerely, yours, C. H. MARCH.

As I said, this does not come from one who is tinged with what you might call bolshevikism, but one who represents the other side, or one, rather, who has been opposed to the farm organization.

Mr. President, I shall not ask a single farmer in my State to testify, because it might be said that you can not get anyone from North Dakota who is not personally interested in growing wheat, and therefore might be a prejudiced witness. I shall not offer here the testimony of a single farmer of my State, but I do intend to offer the testimony of educators of the highest standing from some of the larger Eastern States.

Mr. President, it must not be said that these men are prejudiced in the interest of the farmer. They have told cold facts; they have stated the truth; they have given the Committee on Agriculture facts which can not be controverted by anybody.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I gladly yield.

Mr. GORE. I merely wish to say I am sorry the Senator intends to omit from his list of witnesses the name of Dr. Ladd, president of the Agricultural College of North Dakota. He is one of the highest authorities on this subject in the United States, and his name would command the respect of every one who is at liberty to speak for himself upon this subject.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad the Senator called my attention to that. Of course, Dr. Ladd is not a farmer. He is president of the agricultural college of our State and also a great chemist. Since the Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the committee, has called my attention to it, I want to read a brief letter written by Dr. Ladd on this question. This letter is written to Hugh J. Hughes, care of Farm, Stock, and Home, Minneapolis, Minn., under date of March 8, 1918.

> AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, N. DAK., March 8, 1918.
> HUGH J. HUGHES,
> Care of Farm, Stock, and Home, Minneapolis, Minn.
> DEAR MR. HUGHES: Replying to your letter of February 22, I have gone over carefully the article submitted by you and can indorse the same. The price for wheat, $2.20, is too low—

Now, remember this same Dr. Ladd is one of the members of the price-fixing committee. He has been a member of that committee since its organization—> with conditions as they are at the present time for the terminal markets. It is out of proportion to that of the price of other cereal crops that can be grown in this part of the country; and if the farmer is not wholly disposed to ignore the question of profits and grow the crop as a patriot, there will certainly be a considerable reduction in the acreage.

> The conditions are not wholly favorable in North Dakota at this time for a large acreage of wheat, and to meet obstacles in the price will tend further to discourage; and I see no reason why the farmer should be expected to disregard the question of profitable crops, for I have not been able to see where any manufacturers or producers outside of the farmer have been taking such a course.

I am sure the farmers of North Dakota are ready to do their share, but with the exceedingly high price of feed at the present time and profiteering that has been done with wheat-mill products, will have a tendency to induce the farmer to provide for his own stock for the coming year, as the first step, and then to do what he can with unnourished animals and the shortage of labor, to grow spring wheat; and there is bound to be a decrease rather than an increase in the acreage, if I can judge rightly.

Yours, very truly, E. F. LADD, President.

Mr. President, that letter is in accordance with all the testimony that the members of the Committee on Agriculture have heard. I want to read now from a very distinguished gentleman——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before he reads further, doubtless I have asked many questions in this debate that have not been highly intelligent, and very likely I am going to ask another along that line. At any rate, I am going to ask another.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think the Senator could ask a question that is not intelligent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am somewhat confused about this proposed legislation. As I understand the matter, Mr. Hoover, in virtue of a power conferred upon him through the President, fixed the price of wheat at $2 a bushel.

Mr. GRONNA. May I correct the Senator? Not Mr. Hoover, but a committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. A committee fixed the price of wheat at $2 a bushel originally.

Mr. GORE. A committee of which Dr. Garfield is chairman.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was $2 a bushel originally, was it not?

Mr. GRONNA. No; Congress passed a bill guaranteeing a minimum of $2 to the farmer for the 1918 crop. The committee fixed it on the basis of the Chicago market at $2.20.

Mr. GORE. The crop of 1918.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I knew it was fixed at $2.20. What is suggested to me just at this point in the discussion is this: If we pay by statute law $2.50 for wheat, and then the next crop is a bumper crop, such as I believe you had in 1915—am I right?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; in 1915.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the war comes to a conclusion and the demand for food abroad lessens, can we change the price of wheat by legislation? We have fixed it by legislation and can we change it by legislation if conditions change both as to the product in this country and as to the necessity for the product abroad?

Mr. GRONNA. If Congress should fix a price at $2.50 as a minimum, of course, that would mean that the Government would guarantee the farmers a price not less than $2.50. That is exactly what Congress did for the crop of 1918; it guaranteed to the farmers of the country a minimum price of $2, but Congress did not pass legislation fixing any kind of a price for the farmer's product for the season of 1917.

Mr. GALLINGER. But we are proposing to fix by statute law—at least it is the proposition of the Senator from Oklahoma—$2.50 as the price.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I wish to reinforce what the Senator from North Dakota has said in answer to the Senator's question by saying that all the authorities agree, including our Secretary of Agriculture and others, that the scarcity of wheat in Europe, with her 400,000,000 people, will constitute a sufficient demand for wheat, even though the war should terminate now, to keep and insure a reasonable price for the crop grown in America as well as the crop throughout the world. But if those authorities are in error—and all human authorities may be in error—it would leave us only in this situation.

Should the war end now we shall have hundreds of millions of dollars worth of heavy ordnance, of light arms, of shot and shell and munitions that would be unnecessary and of no service, and would constitute a dead loss on our hands; and yet the United States and the world would be glad to take that loss and see the war terminate now. The wheat situation would not be so bad as that, because even if the war should end and we should have vast supplies of wheat on our hands the wheat would still be serviceable; it would still be fit for human food; it would still be requisitioned; it would not be a dead loss, as the hundreds of millions of military supplies would be.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but, Mr. President, notwithstanding that if we had this surplus of wheat on hand it could be consumed, there would not be very much justice in asking the consumers of the East to use that wheat at $2.50 per bushel if it were not worth that.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the taxpayers of this country, including the consumers of New Hampshire, would be glad to pay for war munitions, even if they should be allowed to rust, to deteriorate, and to become worthless, the consumers of New England would be glad to take that loss. Now, I think that we all ought to pray for a short war, but we ought to prepare for a long one.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. GORE. It is eminently better for us to prepare for a long war and have it turn out to be a short war than it is to prepare for a short war and have it turn out to be a long war. It is merely a matter of providence and foresight. It is better to err on the side of abundance in respect to wheat, as it is better to err on the side of abundance with respect to munitions than to err on the other side; for an error on the other side might be fatal, and an error on the side of abundance will not be fatal.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Oklahoma is right in his general statement. Beyond a question when this war closes—and we all hope it will be before long, although some of us can hardly bring our minds to believe that possible—we shall have ships on our hands; we shall have munitions of war on our hands; we shall have cantonments on our hands; we shall have this job lot of buildings in Washington that disfigure the landscape on our hands and there will be very little value in them. The taxpayers will have to foot the bills; there is no doubt about that; but my question was of a little different character from that. I simply wanted to have my mind satisfied on the point suggested. If we fix the price of wheat by statute law, we can only unfix it by statute law; and if we have a surplus of wheat and no war on our hands, is it right that we should require our people to pay an abnormal price for that commodity and await the slow process of legislation to give relief? That is the point I have in mind.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not know that an unsupported statement from me would be sufficient to convince any Senator, but I want to read the testimony of Prof. G. F. Warren, of Cornell University, and I think his statement will satisfy any of us that there is no danger—I ought rather to say that there is no possibility of either the allies or of the United States having a surplus either of wheat or of other grain. I desire to say most emphatically that the best-informed men in our country agree—and I want the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to hear this—that we to-day are short 350,000,000 bushels of wheat; so there is not much chance of having a surplus; at any rate, not inside of a year; for it takes a whole year to grow a crop. We have never but once had in the United States—and that was in 1915—a wheat crop of more than approximately a little over a billion bushels.

We shall not produce this year to exceed 600,000,000 bushels, and at the utmost 700,000,000 bushels of wheat. In the United States 4½ bushels of wheat are consumed per capita, and it requires at least a bushel an acre for the 60,000,000 acres that must be reseeded next year, which means more than 500,000,000 bushels which we ourselves consume. We should not use that much wheat during the coming year. We must find a substitute; we must use other cereals and save the wheat for our soldiers on the field of battle, and for our allies and for their soldiers.

Mr. President, I want to read from a statement of Prof. Warren.

Mr. GORE rose.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to interrupt me?

Mr. GORE. It may be that what the Senator from North Dakota is about to read will cover the matter, but I wanted to show the expectation for this year's crop of wheat based on the experience of the last 20 years.

Mr. GRONNA. I should be glad to have the Senator from Oklahoma state it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it goes directly to answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The vicissitudes of the weather can be reduced by the law of averages to an approach to certainty, or at least to a basis upon which human foresight may calculate. It is a good deal like life insurance. The statement issued by the Department of Agriculture on December 1 last showed that the winter wheat crop was in worse condition than it had ever been at the same time of the season since the department has kept a record upon the subject. It was seventy-nine and a fraction per cent, taking 100 as the measure. The nearest approach to that was in 1895, when the showing was 81 per cent. So the probabilities are that this year's crop—the crop of 1918—will be one of the worst in our experience.

Taking the last 20 years upon which to calculate the expectation for the harvest of 1918, the showing is that there is one chance in 20 that the crop of 1918 will be 25 per cent less than the crop for 1917, which was itself an extremely short crop. The chances are 10 out of 20 that the crop for 1918 will be more than 6 per cent less than the crop of 1917, which, I repeat, was a short crop. There are only 5 chances in 20 that the crop of 1918 will be as good as the crop of 1917. In other words, the chances are 4 to 1 that the wheat crop of 1918—which may be the crop indispensable to our success in this war—will not be as good a crop as that of 1917.

Mr. President, this result is ascertained by the same methods practically employed in life insurance computations, which may be denominated a science. Weather is a factor in our crops; it must be taken into account; and unfortunately the odds are all against a generous crop in 1918, particularly when we consider the fact that the showing in December last for wheat was the worst in all our history since a record has been kept.

I say this because it tends to minimize the danger if not to remove the possibility of finding upon our hands an enormous and uncalled-for supply of wheat should the world be blessed by an early termination of this war. I think our calculations ought to be made on the other side. I think that providence and prudence alike would constrain us to do everything possible to encourage an increase in the spring sowing of wheat, which it is still possible for us to do. We ought to do everything possible to maintain the winter sowing already in the ground and to prevent it from being turned under and the land sown to a more profitable crop; a thing that is being done and that will continue to be done if the farmer realizes that other crops will pay him a more generous profit than will wheat.

Senators are sometimes misled by this fact; they insist that wheat at $2.20 a bushel will return a profit. It may or it may not, but that is not the pivotal point in this controversy. The question is, Will wheat at $2.20 per bushel, according to the law of averages and probabilities, promise as generous a profit as will other crops which the farmer is at liberty to sow? That is the controlling factor; and we ought not to ignore the factors which are to control this situation and which are to direct the future.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for his contribution. It is very valuable, and I desire to say that his statement is absolutely in accordance with the opinion of the great men who have made a study of agriculture.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I desire the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the suggestion which I want to make. I listened to the Senator's question, and I wondered if I understood this amendment as he does, and if he might not be mistaken in the basis upon which he has been led to ask the question. It is only for the purpose of clearing up a possible misunderstanding of the Senator that I have asked permission to interrupt the Senator from North Dakota.

The Senator from New Hampshire asked if we fixed the price of wheat by statute and then the war ceases and we want to change it, shall we not have to change it by statute? Of course I take it that the Senator from New Hampshire, as well as every other Member of this body, would under no circumstances, after we had fixed the price of wheat, refuse to abide by our action. After we have given our word, we shall keep it. The same rule would apply if the President should fix a different price, as it does apply to the price which the President has fixed at $2.20 a bushel on a certain grade. I wondered if the Senator from New Hampshire, when he asked his question, forgot for the time being that this amendment applies only to the crop of 1918; that it is not a permanent guaranty, but applies only to the crop of one year? Of course, if we adopt the amendment and the war ends, we shall carry out the guaranty. There can not be any doubt about that. But the guaranty ends by its own terms after that crop is disposed of. In other words, one of the things which the producer must show, if such a thing should come about as that the war should cease and the price of wheat should go down, would be that the wheat was produced in the United States and was produced in the year 1918.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for calling my attention to the fact which he has stated. In the multiplicity of work that is thrown upon us in these days, I had failed to observe what he has stated, and I had an impression that this was a permanent price which would have to be repealed by statute.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought probably the Senator from New Hampshire was under that impression.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for correcting me.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it would be no doubt interesting to the Senator from New Hampshire to be informed in this connection that in England they have actually guaranteed the price of wheat up to and including the year 1922, on a sliding scale, however, from last year or this year.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota be kind enough to yield to me again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I may be mistaken about this, and if I am I should like to be corrected. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has given us the statistics and the chances under the law of averages, upon which he bases the statement, in regard to the coming crop of wheat. As I remember, the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture disclosed the fact that the census taken, notably in the great State of New York, showed that the figures of the Agricultural Department were in reality too liberal and that the prospects were not as good as those figures indicated. In the State of New York, where they had made an estimate during the preceding fall, they are taking a new census, and evidence was given to us that, with the figures for one or two counties yet to be completed, but applying the result to those counties which had been obtained in the other counties of the State, the actual census of the wheat acreage demonstrated that there were several hundred thousand acres less planted to wheat than indicated by the figures of the Agricultural Department. I have forgotten the exact number of acres.

Mr. GRONNA. The difference in percentage, I will say to the Senator, was very large.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. So that the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma, as interesting as it is——

Mr. GRONNA. Is very conservative?

Mr. NORRIS. Is very conservative, and the actual facts would probably make the condition appear worse than the picture of the Senator from Oklahoma would show.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the figures are these: The department in its statement of December last estimated the winter wheat sowing in New York at 512,000 acres. The census to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred, which is 90 per cent complete, if the figures hold true for the other 10 per cent, shows 361,000 acres, a falling off, I believe, of something more than 25 per cent—approximately 30 per cent.

Mr. GRONNA. I think I have stated, Mr. President, that the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma, with reference to the decrease in the production of wheat is in accordance with the testimony of the best-informed men of this country who have studied the agricultural problems. Now, for the information of the Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators who favor me with their presence, I want to read a short statement from Prof. G. F. Warren, who is professor of farm management at Cornell University. I think I am safe in saying that Prof. Warren is one of the leading scientists in his particular work not only of his State but of the entire country. Prof. Warren; Prof. E. F. Ladd, of North Dakota; Mr. Wallace, of the Wallace Farmer, of Iowa; and Mr. Owen, of Minneapolis, editor of a farm paper, have all testified—and they are all men who have spent years and years in the study of agricultural questions and have made it their exclusive business to study the problems of agriculture and the problems of farm work—in confirmation of the statement I have made. I read from the testimony of Mr. Warren:

WHEAT ON HAND.

Statistics given out by the Government indicate the present wheat situation to be as given in Table 1. There seems to be enough wheat, but it is too far away. There is a shortage of about 350,000,000 bushels for our allies and ourselves. The thing to do, and the thing that the Food Administration promises to do, is to see that our allies get enough wheat to keep up their fighting spirits. We can eat something else. After we have eaten our share, which we are eating much too rapidly, there will doubtless be pressure to have wheat held for us. When that time comes, there should be a stronger pressure to see that our allies get all the wheat they need.

The estimated surplus of 540,000,000 bushels in countries too far away to make shipment has been cited as evidence that if the war should stop the price of wheat would drop below the price now fixed by the Government. There are millions of Poles, Belgians, Armenians, Turks, Austrians, and Germans who will need wheat when the war closes. Because of this great demand there will then be a greater shortage of food in America than now exists.

That bears out the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

WINTER WHEAT PLANTED.

The comparative acreage of winter wheat and rye planted in different years are given in Table 2. This year there is a marked increase in rye, but only a small increase in wheat. The present wheat acreage is about the same as in 1914. The 1914 crop was planted without "advice" or "campaigns" or fixed prices. It was planted in anticipation of war prices that did not materialize until last year. The reason why prices did not rise in 1915 is shown in Table 6. Had prices of wheat not been regulated, the area planted this fall would probably have been much more. The acreage of winter wheat recommended for this fall by the United States Department of Agriculture was 47,337,000 and the rye acreage 5,131,000. The rye acreage is greater than that recommended by nearly one-fifth, but the acreage of wheat, with its fixed prices, is about the same as that of 1914.

Mr. President, this shows the foolishness of a great government, like the United States, or for any government, making any attempt to fix prices. If I wanted to delay the Senate, I could recite instances thousands of years before the birth of Christ where attempts were made to fix prices. It was tried in ancient Greece and in Rome, and in every instance it has been a failure. Senators, of course, know of the Diocletian edict. In that edict the penalty for not producing and for asking a higher price than a given price was death. What was the result? The result was that the people had to go hungry; and that, I am afraid, will be the result of the foolishness in which we have engaged.

Do not understand that I am asking Congress or that I have at any time asked Congress to fix prices for the farmer more than for anybody else, for I do not believe in the fixing of prices for any commodity. I believe in leaving prices to the law of supply and demand. During this war let those who are engaged in industries make profits, if they can, and then, by taxation, let us take away from them what the Government needs to prosecute the war.

Mr. GORE. And take it from all alike.

Mr. GRONNA. And take it from all alike, as the Senator from Oklahoma suggests. That is the only sound way of proceeding. You can not regulate these matters by fixing the prices of the products of either the farmer or manufacturer. It would be just as unfair to single out any other great industry of this country and say that we will fix a particular price, no matter how unjust or unfair it might be.

Now, Mr. President, let us hear what this great professor has to say about the fixing of prices; but, before I forget it, may I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading a few tables submitted by Prof. Warren?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The corn crop: This year's corn crop is estimated at 3,159,000,000 bushels. The average for the preceding five years is estimated at 2,754,000,000 bushels, but this year's crop includes a large amount of badly damaged corn. At the time when killed by frosts 18 per cent was in the dough stage as compared with 4 per cent in a usual year, 11 per cent was in the milk stage or earlier compared with 1 per cent in a usual year. (U. S. Dept. of Agr., Monthly Crop Report, November, 1917, pp. 105, 110.) Probably that in the dough stage is included in the estimated yield, but it is probable that farmers did not include that in the milk stage in their estimates of yield. Considering the inflated currency and the large amount of soft corn, it is to be expected that corn will sell for much more than the present prices of new corn.

Animals: The approximate efficiency of different animals as producers of human food is shown in Table 3. Dairy cattle are by far the most efficient animals for converting vegetable matter into animal food. Hogs and poultry are efficient, but they use a very high class of food that a cow could also get more out of. Cows also furnish hides.

The results for hogs are estimates. The results for both hogs and steers are too high, as no allowance is made for deaths and for maintenance of breeding stock. Accurate comparisons require that the feed for the entire industry be compared with the returns of the entire industry. Comparisons for mature animals alone are not sufficient.

The relation of population to animals before the war is shown in Table 4. When population becomes very dense men are forced to become the beasts of burden. They are then willing to do the work of a horse to get the horse's food.

[1] An animal unit is one head of grown cattle, or equivalent in other stock. For the United States from 1850 to 1900 the figures are a little low as some young animals are omitted.

The changes in numbers of live stock in various countries since the war began are given in Table 5. The number before the war is compared with the latest figures published by the International Institute of Agriculture. Live stock has decidedly decreased in some countries since these figures were obtained.

The results of this war agree well with the effects of the Civil War except in the case of sheep. In that war the impossibility of getting cotton made sheep increase. The hogs and poultry that consume food fit for human use are decreasing most. A limited number of hogs and poultry can be kept as scavengers, but larger numbers consume grains fit for human use. When men are hungry enough they prefer 7 pounds of corn to 1 pound of dressed pork. There may be some question whether it is desirable for America to materially increase its hogs or poultry, since such an increase comes out of the grain supply. One advantage in increasing hogs now is that it will mean the holding over of corn in the form of pork. If we are not to hold it over as corn, it is certainly well to have it held in some form. Probably it is best to make every effort to keep up the supply of live stock. It will decrease rapidly enough in spite of all efforts. Live stock always tends to decrease in times of food shortage.

THE OUTLOOK FOR NEXT YEAR.

What crops may be expected: Weather and labor are the great factors in crop production and, of these, weather is the dominating one. How variable the seasons are in America is shown in Table 6. On the basis of average yields the area planted for 1915 should have given 838,000,000 bushels of wheat. It did give 1,026,000,000. The production in 1917 was 20 per cent less than that expected from the area planted. Nearly all of our land is subject to severe droughts. In times of peace this was not realized, because a drought merely meant decreased exports or possible imports.

Judging by the past 20 years there is 1 chance in 20 that next year's yield per acre will be less than three-quarters of this year's. In that event, a large part of the live stock would have to be eaten. There are 10 chances in 20 that the yield will be more than 6 per cent below this year's production, and only 5 chances in 20 that the yield will be as good as this year. Or, the chances are 4 to 1 against a crop as good as this year's and 1 to 1 of a crop more than 6 per cent below this year's.

A yield per acre of 10 per cent below this year's production is so common that we should make plans for a year at least this unfavorable. In other words, if we desire reasonable assurance of being able to live as well next year as this year and at the same time export as much as this year, plans should be made to do man's part for a total production of 10 per cent more than was planned for last year. Considering the present condition of the winter wheat, even this is taking enough risk.

Total production of grain: The total production of the six grains, in pounds, is given in Table 8. The crop of 1915 was the largest ever produced and 1917 was the next largest.

Mr. GRONNA. This portion of Prof. Warren's statement which I now desire to read is headed "Some proposed remedies." That is what Senators are waiting for—some proposed remedies—and Prof. Warren gives them:

Price control: One of the important problems of the war is whether to attempt to arbitrarily keep down prices and wages in spite of an inflated currency, or let the cheaper dollar do part service by letting prices and wages rise. Thus far the public agitation has been in the direction of price control. The public seems to have decided to repeal the law of supply and demand. Unfortunately, the repeal applies to supply as well as to demand. Some persons believe that since we are at war, the law of supply and demand fails to operate. It would be as logical to say that a heavy weight repeals the law of gravitation. We should not make the mistake of assuming that man can repeal either law.

When the consumer is in power the goose that lays the golden egg is in danger. We have regulated our railroads for the past decade so completely to the satisfaction of the public that the investor has put his money elsewhere. We are now beginning the same experiment with farming. Much of the agitation for price control fails to distinguish between large corporations that are more or less monopolistic and farming that is made up of millions of small independent units.

The motives for price control are numerous. Business interests want food regulated so that wages will not rise. In effect this means that the farmer's wage is to be reduced so that city wages need not rise. The employer who hopes for cheaper food is in a mood to cause industrial disturbances. The vain hope that food can be made cheap when the supply is decreasing and when its price is measured by a shrinking dollar, leads employers to delay giving inevitable wage increases and thus favors industrial disturbances. Wage demands that may be high at the moment may be amply justified in the near future because of the further decrease in the purchasing power of money. The employer who faces the facts squarely is the one who is in a mood to meet the situation wisely.

Mr. President, there is the whole situation. I agree absolutely with Prof. Warren, and I believe he is right. Prof. Warren further said:

Increased production means more labor: There is no solution of the food problem except more food, and the only way to get more food is either to get out of the way and let it be produced or else do the things that will cause it to be produced. We can not get it by wishing or by editorials or by reducing prices.

I am going to read a letter from a newspaper man in my State, the owner of the largest newspaper in North Dakota. His paper has "roasted" me, and I might say misquoted me, more frequently than any other paper in the State, but I am going to read his letter just the same, because it touches upon the question of production and fair prices. The letter is not addressed to me, but to Mr. H. M. Owen, who testified before our committee, and as he offered it for record I feel at liberty to use it. The letter is as follows:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., March 8, 1918.

Mr. H. M. OWEN,
Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR MR. OWEN: I have your wire and note you ask my judgment as to the feeling of our people in regard to the wheat-acreage situation. Replying, will say most of our people really want to be patriotic and conform to the wishes of the Government regarding crops, but you realize what human selfishness is, and there is no question whatever but that a great many people will seed the kind of grain they believe they can make the most money out of.

We have felt ever since the price was fixed last fall, that the spring-wheat grower was discriminated against in that the price made by supply and demand, which was $3.06 per bushel the day Mr. Hoover made his statement, and it dropped down to below $2 per bushel at the point of loading, especially so in the face of the fact that wheat was the only food commodity on which we were short, and the further fact that the winter-wheat growers had an opportunity to deliver their wheat at the supply-and-demand price, and we were just beginning to deliver ours.

At the present price of corn, oats, barley, etc., wheat is the cheapest food product, even for live stock. A good many of our people will sow the wheat anyway, but you realize that when wheat is lower than other commodities, and the facts are that it is cheaper to feed, even to live stock, and the further fact that at present prices barley or oats, either one, would be more profitable to grow, it will certainly have a tendency to increase consumption and decrease acreage, when the opposite is just what we want. All real loyal citizens are using every opportunity to urge increased acreage of wheat, but you know the results of selfishness and can judge as well as I.

I do not understand why the Government does not either lift the restrictions and let supply and demand govern all these products or else put them all in the list, fix all prices, and that would be comparatively fair to everyone concerned. The Government experts at Washington, I am sure, will agree with us along the line of cost and production.

I am inclosing you copy of brief I furnished the price-fixing committee last fall, and in this schedule there could be added some extra amounts for wages, as they are going to be much higher this year.

Trusting that this may be of some service to you, I am,

Yours, very truly.

J. D. BACON.

Mr. President, I agree with this gentleman in what he says, that if we fix the price of one commodity we ought to fix the price of all commodities. That is the position that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry took when it had the food bill before it last year. You will all remember that that bill included everything—steel, iron, oil, and their products; timber, hides, wool, and their products, and do not forget cotton and its products. That was also in the bill.

When the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said the other day, "We do not need to eat your wheat," I could respond, "We do not need your cotton." Sir, we can produce more flax on 1 acre of land, and spin it into linen, than you can produce on 10 acres of cotton; but that is not the spirit that should prevail among citizens of the United States. Mr. President, we do not need, either, to sow wheat. We have in my State other resources. We have some 20,000,000 acres underlaid with lignite coal; but up to the present time it has not been marketed, because it contains too large a percentage of moisture. But now machinery has been invented for manufacturing coal into briquettes, to take out of the coal the 40 or 50 per cent of moisture and manufacture it into coal briquettes, and I say here that it is as good as the best bituminous coal you can find anywhere. We have 20,000,000 acres underlaid with this coal in my own State. We have more than seven thousand billions of tons of this coal, and we have a vast area of pottery clay. We do not need to raise wheat. So I hope that the Senator from Mississippi, upon reflection, will not contend that he meant his statement seriously when he said: "We do not need to eat your wheat." We do not need to wear your cotton. We can raise sheep, any amount of sheep, in my State. It is the best sheep country in the world, because the air is pure and dry. We can take the fleeces from the sheep's back and manufacture them into cloth, which, I think, even the Members from the cotton States will admit is as good as cotton cloth.

But, Mr. President, I do not want to hear, nor do I want to discuss, the question of North and South, of cotton and wheat. We are a united country. We must be a united country. The amity and good feeling which for years and years has existed between the North and the South ought to and will exist in the future. No man, whether he is from the North or the South, can justly accuse me of discriminating against legislation that has favored the South. There never has been a bill before this body or the other body when I was a Member of it but that I have as willingly voted for appropriations that would benefit the South as for appropriations that would benefit the North.

Mr. President, I want to say that my personal interest in the production of wheat is a secondary and small matter. I want to say that if it had not been for the fact that after hearing these men, patriotic men, coming as they did from all over the United States and testifying to the fact that there will be a shortage of food, I should not have taken a single moment to express any opinion upon this amendment. But I do feel, and I know that every Member of this body, whether he is from a grain-raising State or not, realizes that it is of just as much importance to produce food as it is to manufacture powder, to manufacture guns and munitions of all kinds, and of just as much importance as it is to furnish men.

Mr. President, there were those of us who were not willing, at the particular time the declaration was made, to enter into this war; but I hope that at least no Senator will challenge the patriotism of any of those of us who were in the minority at that time. We are as much interested in the outcome of this war as those of you who were in the majority. We have as willingly given our sons, and many of us have given sons who did not have to go on the field of battle under the law; but after war had been declared, speaking for myself, I knew it to be my patriotic duty to do everything in my power to successfully prosecute the war. Mr. President, we have contributed as liberally as we have been able to contribute to every fund necessary to successfully prosecute the war. It is no longer a mooted question. We are facing a powerful enemy. Every true American must realize that it is his duty as a citizen of this Government to see that a victory with honor is won. Our faces must be turned to the future. We are not living in the past. Autocracy and oligarchy must be crushed wherever found in the interest of people's governments, in the interest of liberty and freedom.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question of price-fixing. That policy has been a failure from the earliest recorded history, and I am afraid it will be a failure in this country. We hope for the best from it, however, because we have started upon it; but it is bound to be unjust where the cost of the article the price of which we try to fix is not also fixed and determined. But what I rose to do was to call attention to a paragraph in a letter which I have received from a farmer who calls attention to what I think is really the most serious situation that confronts the farmer in connection with the production of his crop.

I do not minimize the effect of the increased cost of farm machinery, to which the Senator from North Dakota has referred; but many farmers may not need to buy machinery this year. They can make the old machinery do the work of this year. They may not have to pay these increased costs. But there is one element that the farmer can not escape, and that is the labor proposition.

I want to read just a paragraph of a letter from this farmer that is illustrative of the conditions throughout the country. I do not know; it may be worse in our State than in other States, because of the governmental demands for labor; but this shows about the situation all over the country. He says:

Another matter, Senator, of very great importance to farmers is the matter of extreme high wages. In the first place, the country is being robbed of its young men and that depletes the supply of labor.

I want to say that the writer is not condemning the taking of young men for war purposes, because he was a soldier in the Civil War, and he is for this war; but he simply states the fact in those terms.

We had to pay much more for labor on the farm last year than in former years, and this year it will be still more. My ranch, 40 acres, is just north of "Camp 4" on Cowiche Ridge. Mr. Clarence Livergood has charge of it. He says the Government at Camp 4—is paying $3.30 per day this year for 8 hours, and that at "Rimrock," where the big dam is being built, the Government pays $3.30 for 8 hours, and that we on the farms will have to pay the same. I notice by the papers that the Government has agreed to a schedule of 45 cents and 50 cents per hour in all the lumber regions of Oregon and Washington, and I am expecting the men who work on the farms will make that a clue for demanding the same from us. We are straining every nerve to raise stuff to feed the millions of Europe.

That is an irrigation camp—

What does that mean to the farmer, Mr. President? That means $100 or more a month for farm labor, for farm help; and he can not escape it. Not only is what he has said here true, but the shipyards of our State are taking men from the farms and men from the shops in the small country towns, men from every line of business, and they are making from six to eight or ten or twelve or fifteen dollars a day. These wages will have to be reflected upon the farm, or else the farmer will not get any help. That is all there is to it. So that must be taken into account in the consideration of this proposition.

While I have the floor, I am going to read another letter. It does not bear particularly upon this point, but it simply shows the effect of this constant touch of some governmental bureau or governmental agency upon the industries of our country.

We authorized the President to place an embargo upon exports of our products from this country. Of course it was expected that that power would be exercised wisely We have a War Export Board here in Washington City. They have an agent out in Seattle; and I have here a letter from the chairman of one of our county councils of national defense giving one instance of his experience in connection with this matter. He says:

We have a hard time preaching patience, when we can not give a valid reason for delay. Seems to me the machinery of the Government is cumbersome in the extreme; there does not seem to be the adaptability and tact on the part of some of these bureaus which would inspire confidence.

Those of us down here who are brought in touch with these bureaus can sympathize, I think, pretty strongly with this gentleman's experience in one or two particular instances.

Have before me an application to the War Trade Board for license to ship 20 dressed hogs across the line into Canada. It was flatly denied without any reason whatever being assigned.

He sent me the slip. It was a regular printed form, with blanks to be filled out—one blank for the number of hogs, another blank for the number of the application, and then it had printed on it "This application is denied," with no reason given, no excuse for the action, nor anything of the sort. Now, the application for the shipment of these hogs was to have permission to send them to Grand Forks, in British Columbia. He says:

Grand Forks, British Columbia, is the location of the Granby smelter. It is as much of an employer of American labor as any other, making copper for war purposes. The country is one of our allies. Farmers are feeding these hogs on wheat. There is nothing else to feed them on.

I know that in that section of the country they raise wheat very largely—

What are they to do, eat the pork themselves, or feed seed wheat, which they do not have to spare, until the hogs are fat enough and large enough to sell to the packing houses? They do not want them now, for they are not large enough. I can not explain such actions; I can not satisfy my people, for I do not know what to say.

It is not any wonder that this chairman of the county council of national defense does not know what to say to the farmers whom he has been asking to subscribe to liberty bonds and for Red Cross work and all that sort of thing. It is no wonder that he does not know what to say to them when they make an application to send 20 dressed hogs over to British Columbia, just across the line, to the smelter that is employing American labor as well as Canadian labor, whose product is copper, so necessary in the conduct of the war, and the application is denied without any reason whatever being given for it; yet that is the situation. It does not bear particularly on this wheat proposition, and yet it shows that the wheat is being used for the fattening of these hogs that the Government officials will not permit to be sent where they are especially needed.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. REED. I take this opportunity to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] are engaged in work of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], caused by illness, and at this time beg to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], by reason of illness, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], upon official business.

Mr. GORE. I announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce the absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. KENDRICK] on public business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. As the Senator from Ohio is about to discuss the subject under consideration I am asking him to allow me to put into the RECORD at this time a table which will not only partially explain what my colleague [Mr. GRONNA] has said with reference to farming conditions at the present time but will also answer some of the queries made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am placing it in the RECORD at this time so that the Senator from Ohio may, if he will do me the honor, make such comments upon it as he may desire and criticize it if I am wrong.

I am going to ask to take a family of five persons as the basis of my calculation. Those five persons will consist of the husband and father, the wife, and, we will say, two sons and one daughter. That will give the most favorable conditions to start out in farming, because, under my computation, there will be three laborers capable of performing the labor of a man upon the farm, and two women for the house. Now, we will suppose that this family want to buy a farm and go into the farming business, and I will direct them to go to Ohio and buy a farm there. I asked the Senator from Ohio privately what the general average value of good farm lands in his State was, outside of those tracts which are in close proximity to the great cities and which would be used for gardening rather than farming, and I judge from his statement that in the good sections of Ohio the average value of a farm would be about $125 an acre. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] informs me that it would average about $175 an acre in the State of Illinois, so I will take the cheaper land of Ohio; and this farmer proceeds to buy that land.

Here is my table: I will take 160 acres. At $125 an acre it will cost him $20,000. He will need, in the way of stock and machinery and cows and pigs and the other things that are necessary to start farming on 160 acres, at the present prices, about $5,000. That will be an initial cost of $25,000. Now, I am going to compute this the same as you would if you went into the mercantile business.

Six per cent interest on $25,000 would be an annual interest payment of $1,500. This 160 acres must be fertilized. I think it will cost the farmer nearly $2 an acre to keep it well fertilized, but I will try to be very careful not to overstate the figure, and I will place it at $1 an acre. That will make $160 for fertilizing. This farmer will undoubtedly pay taxes on that farm of 160 acres and all of the personal property which he uses in connection with it to the amount of about $100.

He will also be compelled to buy new machinery and new stock, or his horses may die, and it is a fair and reasonable estimate that you must allow for depreciation, loss in machinery and in horses about $200 per year. Now, he must buy his coal and his fuel. It is safe to say that he can not buy his coal and his fuel for a year for less than $100 at the very least.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He can not get coal at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. But if he bought cordwood and used that instead it would cost him at least $100. It is safe to say that he will have to pay out at least $75 in insurance on all this property—fire insurance and insurance of his stock, and so forth. Then there will be, under my estimate, miscellaneous expenses upon that farm of about $125 to buy the hundreds of little things that have to be bought on the farm outside of what is necessary for clothing and for what we call ordinary living expenses. Now, you will see that that will immediately amount to $2,200. That man, even with those two boys, will have to hire two men about a month and a half during the busy season—that is, from the time the harvest begins until the grain is thrashed. That would be equivalent to three months for one man. He must pay to-day about $80 a month and board. If you hire for the entire year, of course it will be less than $80 a month, as probably in Ohio; but where he hires probably for only a month and a half he will have either to hire by the day or, at the very least, it would cost him $80 a month and board. Now, putting the board at only $20 a month per man, you would have $100 per man, and for the three months you would have $300. So you have now paid out $2,500 during that time.

Remember, if he has 160 acres he must have horses, he must have cattle, he must raise pigs, he must have a portion of that 160 acres to put his buildings on, and he must have pasturage for his cows, he must raise potatoes and garden truck, and he must raise oats for his horses or other feed and hay, and altogether he would have to take at least 60 acres out of the 160 acres for that purpose. That would leave him only 100 acres, then, to raise his wheat on. Now, let us take the average yield, both in Ohio and other places in the United States, at 14 bushels per acre. At 14 bushels per acre, on 100 acres he will have raised 1,400 bushels of wheat. One thousand four hundred bushels of wheat at the present price as fixed by the Food Commissioner would yield him about $2 per bushel. Remember that I have not taken out anything for thrashing this wheat, which would be about 6 or 7 per cent. Remember also that the $2.20 a bushel is for the highest grade of grain, and not one-fifth of the grain in the United States measures up to the highest standard.

So, when you take his distance from the principal interior market and the cost of shipping, the cost of just the thrashing that he will have to pay per bushel, after he furnishes the men himself and his own work, if he gets $2 a bushel at his own elevator he will be doing well. But I will compute it at $2 a bushel, and he would have $2,800.

Now, it has already cost him $2,500. That would give him $300 for one year's work for five adults, and probably there will be children to support and take care of besides those that are working. Dividing that $300 among five people, you have $60 for each one for his year's work. You have $5 a month, or 20 cents a day. That is the estimate that I made some years ago, and it will hold good even at $2 a bushel with the cost of everything that the farmer has to purchase. Now, just stop and think of that for a single moment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in just a minute. He must purchase all his groceries; he must buy all his medicines; he must pay all his doctor bills; and he must buy everything that is needed in the shape of the ordinary things that enter into the life of an individual for $60 a year, or $5 a month, and he will not have a great deal left for the Red Cross unless he cuts out his tobacco and other little comforts of that kind. I simply give that table to show that his year's labor will not give him a sufficient additional sum to buy two suits of clothes a year, and it will not give him as much as your ordinary laborer in the steel mills in Ohio and Indiana will earn in two weeks.

Therefore, you can draw your own conclusion. I have not given anything but the most moderate figures here. With wheat at $2 a bushel, and with the number of acres that must be taken out of the total of 160 to raise his other cereals, his hay, his corn for his pigs, his pasture for his cow, and his oats for his horses, 100 acres would be as much as he could possibly put in wheat, and that would be all he would get his money for.

Mr. President, I think that table demonstrates rather conclusively that under present conditions, even with $2 wheat, the farmer will not and can not raise wheat, especially when he buys land at $125 an acre. I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely wish to say that my sympathies are with the farmer, and I will not enter into any details regarding the calculation made by the Senator. I simply wish to suggest that his man made a mistake in the beginning. He ought to have gone down to Florida and bought land at $10 an acre, cleared it, put it in cultivable condition for about $30 an acre, and grown four full crops a year.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator will remember that all our Florida people are protectionists, and he gets a pretty good protection upon the oranges and citrus fruits and all that, while wheat, which we raise up North, is on the free list. So the farmer down there would have a distinct advantage.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think there is any protection on the orange crop.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the statement made by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], save and except to say that I neither agree with his premises, his conclusions, nor his process of reasoning. If the Standard Oil Co. would employ him as an accountant, I am sure there would be no income tax to pay by that company.

I only want to allude to one particular fact. When he speaks of the average crop of wheat in Ohio as being 14 bushels to the acre, I hope my friend knows more about farming in North Dakota than he does about farming in Ohio. The average production in Ohio is, I believe, about 23 to 25 bushels to the acre. I do not have exact figures before me. Last year in many sections 40 bushels to the acre was not an uncommon yield. I have been told in one township in Wayne County the entire township averaged 40 bushels to the acre.

But I do not intend to discuss the question of the yield. Suffice it to say that in my judgment the price fixed by the President of $2.20 per bushel is ample as a minimum price, and I can neither find it in my conscience nor in my heart to attempt to place a minimum price of $2.50 upon wheat at this particular time.

I am not here to challenge the loyalty of North Dakota's farmers. I am not here to question their good citizenship. In my judgment the vast majority of all the people in all the States are absolutely loyal to America and to America's cause. But I want to point out one or two facts which seem to have been overlooked by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I was touched by his eloquent words when he referred to the farmer boy from North Dakota who had gone to the trenches, and I indorse everything he has said about that boy, but when it comes to the fixing of prices to be charged for wheat I want to ask him this question:

There are hundreds of thousands of boys from all over the States of the Union who are going to the trenches, giving their all, placing their very lives upon the altar of their country, and while they are there fighting this battle for you and for me there is an effort made on behalf of certain farmers to enable them to charge their wives and babies at the rate of $2.50 per bushel for the wheat out of which their bread is made. Let us pause and think whether that is right or not.

I yield to no man in my love for the farmer. I do not question his loyalty or his patriotism, neither do I question the loyalty or the patriotism of the workingman or the working woman who must buy bread in order to sustain life. I believe in the loyalty of the washerwoman and the seamstress who must pay these excessive prices for wheat and for flour and for bread.

Now, Mr. President, I happen to know a little bit about farming myself.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POMERENE. Only for a question.

Mr. GORE. Not for a question; but I wish to cite an instance where a young man in my State had been drafted and is now in the service. I will divert it into a question. He raised 2,700 bushels of wheat last year, enough to feed 550 soldiers. He has a wife and children. He is now in the service, and his Government, in behalf of which he is now imperiling his life, compelled him to take $2,000 less for his wheat than it was worth in the markets of the country, and his family must subsist in his absence, and they lack the $2,000 and probably need the $2,000 that they would otherwise have received.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Does not that appeal to the Senator's sympathies as well as to his sense of justice?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, it does appeal to my sympathy to think that any man is going abroad; but the man who has 2,700 bushels of wheat is not a pauper by any means.

Mr. President, up until two years ago, I dare say, there was not a farmer in either North Dakota or Ohio who would not have been glad to have contracted his entire crop at $1 per bushel. Make it $2 and you still have room for doubling his cost, and a handsome profit besides.

Our friends in North Dakota speak of the poor crop they have had there, and I have a good deal of sympathy with them because of the partial failure of the crop in North Dakota and other States, particularly in the arid regions. But let us talk seriously about this matter. Assuming that it was a total failure, is that a reason why we should place an exorbitant price upon wheat? They are not in the habit of having failures in North Dakota. In 1915 they raised 151,000,000 bushels of wheat. Last year, I believe, according to the figures presented by the junior Senator from North Dakota they raised 60,000,000 bushels. The minimum price fixed in the law which we passed last year was $2. The minimum price provided for in this bill is $2.50. If they should have a crop equal to the crop in 1915 of 151,000,000, the 50 cents a bushel means just $75,500,000 to the one State of North Dakota. In my own State of Ohio last year we raised over 41,000,000 bushels of wheat. Fifty cents a bushel means just $20,500,000 to the farmers of my State.

I am glad to say for one, speaking for the farmers of Ohio generally, I thank God they are not here asking for this increase in price.

Mr. President, this subject matter was before the Congress last year—in September, I think. Out in my own State we have a Mr. A. P. Sanders, who for years was secretary and later president of our agricultural board. He is one of the most wide-awake and well posted men I know of on the subject of farming and farm products. He took it upon himself to make an independent investigation as to what should be the minimum and maximum prices fixed for wheat. He sat down and sent out a questionnaire to 210 citizens of Ohio scattered throughout the State. He tells me that among them were institute lecturers, leading farmers, a few grain-elevator men, leading stockmen, and officials of the State grange. He got replies from 149. He subdivided them as follows:

The farmers from northwestern Ohio sent in their report and the average maximum price by those farmers was $1.9921. The average minimum price they fixed was $1.4732.

In northeastern Ohio the average maximum price was $2.2317; the minimum price, $1.528.

In southeastern Ohio the average maximum price which they fixed was $2.0311; the average minimum was $1.50.

In southwestern Ohio the average maximum was $2.2211; the average minimum, $1.563.

The average throughout the States was as follows:

Average maximum, $2.119.

Average minimum, $1.5162.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. For a question only.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask what the date of that estimate was?

Mr. POMERENE. It was some time in August of last year, as I recall the statement in the letter to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator made any effort to get an estimate for the present time?

Mr. POMERENE. I have not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator have the general average?

Mr. POMERENE. That is what I gave a moment ago. The Senator overlooked it. Those were the last figures I gave. The average minimum throughout the State was $1.5162, and the average maximum $2.119.

Mr. REED. My question is not as to the general average, but the two smallest numbers give the average minimum, and you get the average maximum by taking the two largest. What I am trying to get at is how these figures show an average.

Mr. POMERENE. I hope the Senator will do me the credit of believing that I would not intentionally deceive the Senate in a statement of facts.

Mr. REED. Certainly not. I have not intimated anything of that sort.

Mr. POMERENE. I am sure of that; but the suggestion would indicate that my figures might be misleading, and in view of that statement I propose to explain them.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, since he takes that view of it, I understood he was giving all the figures, and I was merely asking for light as to how he arrived at the average. I hope the Senator will not construe anything I have said as anything more than an effort to get at just what the facts are.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not so construe it, but in view of the question I wanted to make my position perfectly clear. While this investigation was going on some 94, as I remember, of these reports were sent to my own office. The returns were then not all in, and I had the clerks in my office add together all the minimum prices and divide them by the number of minimum prices, and add together all the maximum prices and divide them by the number of maximum prices which were given, and the minimum price at that time on the ninety-odd reports we had was $1.49, the maximum was $2.10½. The figures I have just given are from memory, but I am certain I am not out of the way 1 cent a bushel. The averages I give to-day are based upon 149 answers, and they raise the minimum slightly and the maximum slightly.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask the Senator if the figures he is now presenting were the figures he presented about a year ago?

Mr. POMERENE. Not exactly, as they were presented at that time. At that time the conclusions I gave were based upon figures contained in about 94 reports, as I remember. They are included in the averages I have given here to-day.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I know some of these farmers, and I know some of the men who answered this questionnaire, and they are intelligent men. They are prosperous farmers; they are patriotic citizens. There were several who put the prices high. I remember of one man who placed a maximum price of $3.50, but when I investigated his pedigree I found he had some official position connected with agriculture, catering to the farmer element, himself a political farmer, one of that type of farmers who farm farmers and not farms.

Mr. President, looking at this from the standpoint of a Senator from Ohio, when the farmers of the State fix a minimum of $1.5162 and a maximum of $2.119, would I be justified in asking all the people of Ohio and all the breadeaters everywhere to pay for their wheat at the rate of $2.50 a bushel?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POMERENE. For a question.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask the Senator a question, and I wish to eliminate one point on which we two agree first. There can not be any possible doubt that the farmer can produce wheat in Ohio at a profit. Where the yield is 40 bushels to the acre $2 is a splendid remuneration. The Senator says last year the average in Ohio was 23 bushels per acre. In the United States there were 60,000,000 acres sown last year and there were 651,000,000 bushels.

Mr. POMERENE. I am yielding for a question.

Mr. GORE. I am basing it on this statement——

Mr. POMERENE. I want to get through with this argument, not that I care to avoid a controversy at all, but I do not care to consume too much time.

Mr. GORE. The point is this: The average in the United States was 10 bushels to the acre. There must have been millions of acres which produced less than 10 bushels to the acre to bring the splendid crop of Ohio down to the average of 10 bushels. Does not the Senator think in a crisis like that the problem which we must solve is to devise ways and means to enable the man who produces below the average to produce near the margin of profit?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will answer the question and I will answer, "Yes." My answer is that when the people of my State say that $1.51 is a good average minimum price for wheat, then it is my judgment that $2.20 ought to be a good minimum elsewhere.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio allow me merely to ask him a question?

Mr. POMERENE. I will.

Mr. McCUMBER. My first question was simply whether or not I understood the Senator correctly to say that the average yield of wheat in Ohio is 23 bushels per acre?

Mr. POMERENE. It is 23 bushels per acre; I think I put it from 23 to 25 bushels per acre; something like that. I have not looked at the figures recently.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator wants to be accurate. I sent for the Agricultural Department report, and I find that for the past 10 years the average yield of wheat in Ohio has been 15.9 bushels per acre.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it has been some time since I looked at the figures relative to the yield of wheat in Ohio, but I think it will be found that the Senator is in error. It may be that in certain years the yield would be as low as that stated by him.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have taken the average yield for the last 10 years, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HARDING. I think the statement as to average yield in 1917 is correct when it is placed at 23 bushels per acre, and the lower average yield, as stated by the Senator from North Dakota, must cover a period of years when we, along with others, had our crop failures.

Mr. POMERENE. That may be so.

Mr. President, the plea has been made here for higher prices for wheat because of a crop failure in certain States. I ask my friends everywhere, is it fair to base an average price upon the fact that there has been a partial failure or a total failure of the crop in certain sections of the country? The proposition needs only to be stated to fall.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, was the Senator from Ohio asking me a question?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I was just putting a question generally.

Mr. GORE. I beg pardon.

Mr. POMERENE. Last year the yield of wheat in the United States was 650,828,000 bushels Assuming that the yield this year will be the same, an additional 50 cents per bushel to the price of wheat means $325,414,000. In these days, when the prices of foodstuffs are going skyward, what answer can I make to the poor and the laboring classes everywhere when I seek to do that?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORE. The Senator, I believe, voted to give the railroads the right to go into court to determine whether or not the standard return to be fixed by the President was just compensation. Is the Senator willing to let the farmers go into court when the Government arbitrarily fixes the price of their wheat and have the question determined as to whether or not it is just compensation under the Constitution?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, when we take the wheat, yes; but we are called upon here to fix a minimum price for wheat for the purpose of encouraging production; that is the reason for fixing a price.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, another question. Does the Senator understand that the price of $2.20 recently fixed by the President is the minimum and that the farmer will be allowed to receive whatever price above that amount he may be able to obtain?

Mr. POMERENE. It is a guaranteed price, as I understand.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator understand that the farmer will be allowed to take for his wheat any price over and above $2.20 a bushel?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know; I have not gone into that.

Mr. GORE. But is not that vital?

Mr. POMERENE. It may be so, but I want to say that $2.20 a bushel, with an average crop, is all that any man ought to ask for his crop.

Mr. GORE. Is that a legislative or a judicial question? Who ought to decide that, and who is to decide it under the railroad bill?

Mr. POMERENE. In the case of the railroad legislation, we are taking their property whether they are willing or not.

Mr. GORE. So we are that of the farmers.

Mr. POMERENE. No; we are not taking over their property; we are trying to encourage their production. That is why we have this legislation. The Senator asked me whether it is a legislative problem? My answer is, "No"; it ought to be an executive problem under reasonable and proper regulations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Ohio not understand that, whether we call this price a minimum price or a price given for encouragement or by whatsoever name we call it, as a matter of fact it is the only price that the farmer is permitted to receive?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know that.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator not know that, through the medium of the licensing power, through the medium of the voluntary agreement between the board of trade men and also between the millers, and by virtue of the fact also that all wheat for foreign shipment is purchsed through the wheat corporation, there is but one price possible to be received by the farmer and that price is the price which has been fixed?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that has affected the price; there can not be any question about it.

Mr. REED. To be frank, has it not absolutely fixed the price?

Mr. POMERENE. In the main, perhaps, it has.

Mr. REED. Well, not in the main, but altogether?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, I have gone as far as I care to go with that. I know that the Senator's views on this subject and mine are diametrically opposed.

Mr. REED. But they are not diametrically opposed on this fact, I hope.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps not on the fact. It has been deemed wise to have but one buying agency for the purpose of supplying our allies and ourselves.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, the only question I am asking is, whether that one buying agency does not have one price; and with one buying agency with one price, if that does not fix the price for the seller?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have made the statement that it was a controlling factor, but it does not control all of the prices; it is not the whole element. I do not care, however, to go into that question very much further except to point out, if I can, the position the Congress ought to take.

I recognize the fact that we can not put a dollar into the pocket of the farmer without taking it out of the pocket of the washerwoman or other consumer, and that when we are fixing the price of foodstuffs proper regard should be had for the encouragement of production; but ought we not also to pay a proper regard to those who must eat? The other day something like this was said facetiously, that $3 per bushel wheat was better than no wheat at $2 a bushel; but, like all half truths, it is the worst kind of a falsehood. What does $5 a bushel wheat mean if the consumer has not the money to pay for it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POMERENE. I do, for a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator from Ohio contend that when the consumer has not the money to pay for it, wheat would stay at $5 a bushel?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, here comes our old friend, supply and demand; the rule which is invoked upon every occasion; and there never was a worse abused rule in the world than just that one. The great economists, who pored over their books dreaming, long years ago announced the rule, and, as a general proposition, it is sound; but when the law of supply and demand is not permitted to operate, it does not control the price. It never did and it never will.

Mr. GORE. Then, who does and what does in that case?

Mr. POMERENE. I will answer the Senator, if he will be a little patient.

Mr. GORE. I am perfectly patient, and I shall wait a long time for an answer.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, if it is to get an answer that will satisfy the Senator, he will, perhaps, never get it, because his ideas are fixed upon that proposition.

Mr. President, last year in the course of a few weeks the price of wheat went skyward, until in some localities it was sold for $3 a bushel and $3.25, and even as high, if my memory serves me aright, as $3.50 a bushel.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I know the Senator wants to be correct. I desire to inform him that the highest price which was paid for wheat in the foremost terminal market in the country was $3.06.

Mr. POMERENE. I am trusting to my memory, but I think the Senator from North Dakota is wrong about that. However, I will accept his statement.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question while I am on my feet?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Ohio is complaining because the washerwoman will have to pay for wheat or flour the increased price provided by the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. That increase is 30 cents a bushel, is it not?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Ohio knows as well as I do that per capita we do not consume more than one barrel of flour per year, which never exceeds 4½ bushels.

Mr. POMERENE. I have heard that statement made before, and I trust the Senator from North Dakota will not encroach upon my time in that matter.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senator will permit me to finish the question. The increased cost of the flour will be from $1.25 to $1.35 per capita, possibly, for the entire year. Is it not a fact right now that the Senator from Ohio is compelling the same washerwoman to eat something else than wheat, which is costing her more and which is not so valuable for food?

Mr. POMERENE. My answer is "no." Every Senator knows that the very minute that we add 25 cents to the price of a bushel of wheat by the time it gets around to the consumer there will be several times 25 cents added to the flour produced from that bushel of wheat.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Ohio make the assertion that that is the case when Mr. Hoover is in control and regulating it from the farmer to the consumer?

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Missouri is "still harping" on my daughter.

Mr. REED. Oh, the Senator ought to set that up in quotation marks.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that very fully.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio if it is true now—and we can not get away from these things by any fulminations—I want to know if the Senator means that since Mr. Hoover has taken control conditions are still so bad that 25 cents added to a bushel of wheat will mean three or four or five times that amount added to the flour that the consumer buys?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have made no such statement, and the Senator from Missouri has no right to draw any such inference from any statement that I have made on the subject.

Mr. REED. I trust the Senator will read the notes of his speech.

Mr. POMERENE. I recognize the fact that when it comes to the question of Hoover the Senator from Missouri and I can not agree. I have no doubt that Mr. Hoover has done some things that he perhaps ought not to have done, but on the whole he has done a great service to the people of this country and to the allies generally. If it had not been for what we have been doing on this subject, legislatively as well as through the Food Administration, the price of flour to-day would be from $20 to $25 per barrel. It did get to $18 per barrel in this city just before he took charge.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate, if I may do so briefly, to another proposition. On March 1, according to the report of the Agricultural Department, there was a wheat supply on the farms amounting to 111,272,000 bushels; on that day there were in the country mills and elevators 68,972,000 bushels; or, in round numbers, about 180,000,000 bushels. Note that about two-thirds of this wheat was then in the possession of the farmers. I have letters from leading farmers in Ohio in which they estimate that from one-fourth to one-third of the crop of last year is still in the bins on their farms waiting for higher prices. Certain legislation was proposed in the Senate, one bill suggesting a minimum of $2.50 per bushel and another bill suggesting $2.75 per bushel; and partly in anticipation of the higher prices suggested by this legislation this wheat is still kept on the farms and in the bins, and the allies are suffering for the want of it to-day.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, is aware that the proposed increase to $2.50 applies only to wheat harvested in 1918, and does not apply to a single bushel of wheat harvested in 1917? So this bill would not have any effect on the wheat that has already been harvested.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I understand that suggestion is made; but I suspect we would have to send the Senator from Oklahoma and some others out to tag all the 1917 crop of wheat so as to be able to distinguish between the products of 1917 and that of the year 1918.

Mr. GORE. In Ohio?

Mr. POMERENE. No; not in Ohio; we are not asking for this increase.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. The Senator states that, by virtue of this proposed price, wheat has been held up and the allies are suffering for wheat. That statement ought not to go to the country unless the Senator knows it to be true.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that there are millions of bushels of wheat in the ports of America to-day waiting for bottoms to transport them to Europe?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have stated that there were 68,972,000 bushels of wheat in the country mills and elevators; that is, there were on March 1. I have not anything later on the subject. It may be that a part of this wheat was in the ports.

Mr. REED. Then, how can the Senator say that by virtue of this bill the allies are to-day suffering for the wheat when he admits there are 68,000,000 bushels in the market to-day, practically every bushel of which is under the control of the Food Administration?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, I can not refer to every fact in connection with this subject at one time. One of the distinguished Senators—I think, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], perhaps—this morning offered a report of a speech made by M. Tardieu, the French commissioner, bearing upon this subject, showing the decrease in the allowance of bread to the French people during the last few months, due to the fact they could not get the usual supply. They are not getting enough to meet their requirements. It may be that they are not suffering, as I have suggested; I hope they are not——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Just one moment, please; but it seems to me it ought to occur to Senators that while we are trying to boost prices in this kind of a way the men who still have wheat in their bins will probably continue to hold it. I can read some letters on the subject, if it is required.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator know that, under section 4 of the food-control act, the Government of the United States can commandeer every bushel of wheat in the United States?

Mr. POMERENE. I suspect it can.

Mr. GORE. In the hands of the farmer or anybody else, except what he needs for feed and domestic use?

Mr. POMERENE. The Government no doubt can commandeer it at any time.

Mr. GORE. Will the Government of the United States permit its allies to suffer when it has the power to commandeer wheat in the hands of the people who are hoarding it and withholding holding it from them?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not care to take the time to answer a question like that.

I will read part of a letter which I received from one of the most intelligent business men in Ohio, whom I have known personally for many years. He is a patriotic man and is in constant touch with farmers, and among other things he makes this statement:

> There have been offered lately in the Senate two bills proposing to raise the price of wheat to $2.50 or $2.75—the best means I know of to withdraw wheat from the market—

I will not read the whole of the letter—

> This eternal tinkering with measures has done more to retard preparations for the war than all other causes combined. When the price of wheat was fixed some time ago they ought to have had enough data at hand to have known whether the price was right or not. If the price is not high enough, the change ought to be made without a moment's unnecessary delay and settle the question so that the wheat would again come from its hiding. There is more wheat over the country than is generally believed, if our observations amount to anything, and I am in pretty close touch with the farmers. The great complaint of the farmers is that there is no market for their wheat. I was talking to one farmer in an adjoining county not long ago, and he said he had 300 bushels of wheat, but could find no market for it. He said that another neighbor had 400 bushels in the same shape. He told me that one of his neighbors last fall had to sack and haul his old crop to a neighbor for storage before he could thrash his new crop. A man in our office stated just this morning that he saw a man the other day who had 900 bushels of wheat and could not find a market, as the Alliance Mills would not buy it on account of restrictions—

And so forth.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, is that letter from Ohio?

Mr. POMERENE. That letter is from Ohio.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POMERENE. For a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know why it was that those farmers could not sell their wheat? I happen to know, and if the Senator will permit me two or three sentences I will be glad to tell him.

Mr. POMERENE. I think I understand. There was some question of transportation——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. POMERENE. There was some question of regulation about it, which affected the situation. Suffice it to say that the wheat has not yet been sold.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the reason is that the Food Administration issued an order which in effect prevented mills purchasing wheat. I know of many mills now closed down, and the farmer drawing his wheat to those mills has had to draw it home again. That is just what has happened.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true in certain sections.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is true all over the country, in many sections.

Mr. POMERENE. But we are discussing now the question as to the price of wheat, and everything else is incidental to it. I have a number of other letters here bearing upon the same subject, but I do not believe I will take the time to read them. Many of these farmers are holding for higher prices, and this legislation is just the kind of legislation that encourages that practice.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator stated a moment ago that the wheat has not been sold because the farmers could not find any buyers, and now he states it is because they are holding it for higher prices.

Mr. POMERENE. I state both facts, and there is nothing inconsistent between them, in my judgment.

Mr. GORE. Well, of course, the Senator may himself be able to reconcile contradictory statements of that sort, but they do not seem consistent with each other.

Mr. POMERENE. I think they are thoroughly reconcilable. Mr. President, it has been suggested that the price of wheat ought to be raised because wheat is now being fed to stock, due to present low prices. There has been wheat fed to stock, but my judgment is, from a report made by the Agricultural Department, that it is not more than usually is so fed. I have before me the monthly crop report for March. The statistician made a special telegraphic inquiry, under date of March 2, in 15 of the leading wheat-producing States concerning the amount of 1917 wheat crop fed to live stock.

> The responses show that the amount of wheat fed to live stock is less than in former years, except in a few States or sections where there was difficulty in obtaining other feed stuffs.
> The highest figure reported, 7 per cent, was from Montana, where in some sections feeding of wheat was necessary to prevent live stock from starving. In Oregon 6 per cent was fed. These two States together account for about 2,000,000 bushels thus fed. Washington reports 4.5 per cent, being 1,500,000 bushels, against 2,300,000 usually fed. Moderately heavy feeding in western and west central Texas and Oklahoma in sections where other crops were almost a total failure, in order to save live stock, has required about 800,000 bushels in the former State and 900,000 in the latter, being 5 per cent and 2½ per cent of the total crops of those States. Something over 1,000,000 bushels have been fed in North Dakota, about 2 per cent of the crop. Ohio has fed less than a million bushels, and less than 2 per cent of its crop.
> Pennsylvania reports almost 1,500,000 bushels, or about 6 per cent of the crop.
> The remaining States report very small quantities of wheat being fed. It appears that the total quantity of wheat fed to live stock will not exceed 2 per cent, and that the sound wheat fed is probably within 1 per cent of the crop. A large part of the wheat fed is inferior or musty grain unfit for milling. A considerable amount of it represents the screenings from seed wheat. In Ohio it is reported that 49 per cent of the wheat fed was of grades 1 and 2, 15 per cent of grade 3, and 36 per cent of grade 4, screenings and spoiled wheat. Sixty-four per cent of that was fed to poultry, 26 per cent to hogs, and 10 per cent to other animals.
> Except in some of the Western States named, the principal consumption of wheat fed has been by poultry.

Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that there is in any locality a necessity for feeding wheat to stock, if there is a necessity; and I doubt not that there is a necessity in some places to do it. That is one of the things which will happen in a great country like this; but I do not believe that there is going to be very much $2 or $2.20 wheat fed to stock.

I realize that it has been said that barley and rye and oats and corn have reached abnormally high prices. That is true; but is it not due to the general rule of supply and demand? The fact is, as I was informed on yesterday, that within the last few days the price of corn has fallen 30 cents per bushel. The reason for these high prices for other cereals, as I have been informed by students who have investigated the subject, is that because of the great car shortage during the last three or four months it has been impossible to get the necessary transportation to move the corn and the barley, the rye, and the oats from the producer to the consumer. Perhaps two weeks ago one of the leading farmers in my own State said that 60 per cent of his corn was still in the shock.

The transportation situation has greatly improved within the last few weeks, and last week I was informed at the office of the Director General of Railroads they were then moving the corn at the rate of 3,000,000 bushels per day; and we have had the resultant fall in the price of corn as it gets to the market.

Mr. President, perhaps I am wrong in my economic theories. In normal times I have no sympathy with price-fixing legislation. I have so expressed myself repeatedly; and if the law of supply and demand were permitted to operate I would not advocate price fixing. But when it is not permitted to operate, when prices are out of all reason compared with the cost of production, when we know that the supply is in the country, then are we to have these prices mounting higher and higher, and is Congress simply to sit here and say: "The law of supply and demand shall control"? It is true that, covering a period of years, it may be said, generally speaking, that supply and demand will control prices; but I should dislike to think of the suffering that would have occurred in this country if it had not been for price fixing in connection with wheat and sugar. We knew last year that the prices were going higher than they had ever been before, and it was only the drastic methods adopted by the Congress and the Food Administration that kept them within bounds.

I think there has been one mistake made in this legislation. In my judgment, when we sought to fix the price of wheat the price within reasonable limits should have been fixed upon the cereals competing with wheat. Of course, some one asks me: "Well, how far would you go?" Mr. President, that is a difficult question to answer. I wish it were not necessary to take the first step; but when it comes to the basic articles it does not hurt my conscience in the least to say that the producer shall be satisfied with a reasonable price. I have no sympathy with profiteering, whether it is by a banker, by a steelmonger, by a copper producer, by a wheat raiser, or by a cotton grower.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. For a question.

Mr. REED. I asked the Senator the other day a question to which I hope he will now give us a direct answer. Is he in favor now of regulating the other cereals produced upon the farm and reducing their prices so that they will be in proportion to the present price of wheat?

Mr. POMERENE. I just answered that question a moment ago, and said that I was in favor of legislation of that character.

Mr. REED. I did not understand the Senator's statement to have gone as far as that; but I now understand his statement to mean just that—that he is in favor of reducing the prices of the other grains so that they will correspond and bear their proportion to the wheat price. Now, I want to ask him another question: Is he willing to carry the price regulation to the point of regulating the wages of farm hands, so that they will be in proportion?

Mr. POMERENE. I am not.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator willing to carry it so far as to regulate the price of the harness which the farmer has to buy and the shoes which he has to buy?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I recognize the Senator's viewpoint on the subject. I have said before that he and I could not agree, and I emphasize that now. I voted for the legislation to place agricultural implements under the price-fixing powers of the Government, and I favor it now.

Mr. REED. I am asking about harness, and shoes, and clothing, and hats, and caps, and shirts—the things that the farmer has to consume.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's question, and I think he understands my position.

I have said in substance that so far as the basic articles are concerned I am willing to fix those prices. When it comes to the details of the manufactured articles, I would go step by step as conditions might seem to justify.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will be patient with me, I am simply trying to get his viewpoint. I think he is entirely willing to give it to us, and I think the country is interested in it.

Mr. POMERENE. I think I have made myself perfectly clear to anyone who wants to understand me.

Mr. REED. I wanted to ask the Senator this question—well, I will not ask it, for I think the Senator is out of patience with me.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senator realizes that that line of questioning has gone about as far as it ought to go. I think he understands my position, as I understand his position.

Mr. President, I have some further information on the cost of wheat production which I intended to submit earlier in my remarks.

I desire to say in advance that I have made an effort to find out from the Agricultural Department the cost of wheat production in the various sections of the country. My messenger was informed that there has been no general investigation of this subject since 1910, and of course figures as of that date would give us very little light now. I have, however, some other data. There has been some investigation made by a part of the Agricultural Department, or some bureau in it. They decline to give such information as they have, realizing that there are many uncertain elements about it. I make that explanation because I want to be perfectly fair about the statement that I am about to read.

I have a letter from a grain dealer in Indiana, under date of March 9. He incloses to me a circular which was issued by the agricultural extension department of Purdue University. This article deals with wheat and several other farm products, and I am going to read that part of the statement which relates to wheat:

Last August this office secured for the Department of Farm Management at Washington an itemized statement of the cost of producing the 1917 crop of wheat on four farms in this county. The average cost of growing a bushel of wheat on these four farms, including its delivery to market, was found to be $1.11.

That was last year—

A summary of similar data collected from 207 farms in Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan shows that the average cost of producing a bushel of wheat in 1917 was $1.20. Twenty-five men in this county are now cooperating in keeping records on the cost of producing the wheat crop sown last fall.

I know the high reputation of the University of Purdue. I took pains to inquire of my friend the distinguished Senator from Indiana, and he advises me that the investigations made by this university are of a high order. I do not know that I quote him accurately, but he said that in substance; and I have no doubt that this price of $1.20 per bushel is an outside figure in those States. The President saw fit the other day to fix a price of $2.20 per bushel, and we are now asked to add 30 cents a bushel more to that price.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORE. Is the Senator aware that the president of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of North Dakota made a study as to the cost of production in North Dakota for the season of 1917 and found that the price was $2.19 per bushel, and that in Minnesota a study was made and it was found to be $3.01 a bushel? I may add, if the Senator will pardon me, that I do not know whether it was the Agricultural Department or not; I assume that it was; but somebody has caused the county demonstrators in my State to make a survey, taking 10 typical farms in the wheat counties. I say, I presume it was the Department of Agriculture. Several of their answers have been sent to me, clippings from newspapers and otherwise; and when I saw their statements I was satisfied that whoever it was that was gathering the data was going to make it public.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Oklahoma must find himself in the same predicament that everyone else does when he quotes the cost of wheat production or the cost of farm products. We must have a whole lot of other facts and details before we can fix an average figure for the whole country. I recognize the fact that in the State of Oklahoma, in its semi-arid regions, last year there was a partial failure of the wheat crop, but that partial failure does not occur every year. It is an exception when it occurs there, as it is an exception when it occurs elsewhere. The same may be said of certain sections of Minnesota and North Dakota and South Dakota and the Intermountain States. But I submit that no business man would attempt to estimate the cost of production upon his knowledge of what the cost of production was upon a farm when the crop was a complete failure or a partial failure. That is why I was so anxious to get a statement of the average cost. If I knew the average cost in Ohio and North Dakota and South Dakota and Oklahoma and all the wheat-producing States, then I would be better able to determine within reasonable bounds what the price should be. I do not lose sight of the fact, when we are discussing cost prices, that the advantage, generally speaking, is all with the Western and the Northwestern farmer, because he has cheaper land, and it is more easily farmed.

Mr. President, a word further about the cost of labor.

I have some figures here before me. They do not bear out the inference that there is a general increase in farm labor to $5 per man per day. I have no doubt that there are occasions when and places where some men make some demands of that character. We were told the other day, in the course of this debate, that an I. W. W. in the State of North Dakota had been employed at $4 a day, and later wanted $5, and quit work because he could not get it. I have no doubt that that is so, but I would demand more evidence before I could be made to believe that the people of North Dakota who work upon the fields are, generally speaking, I. W. W.'s. I do not believe they are.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield for a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator if he believes that the figures which I gave for a month and a half of work in the busy season, we will say, or what will be the busy season in 1918 in Ohio, would be less than at the rate of $80 a month and board?

Mr. POMERENE. I did not catch the first part of the Senator's question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator if he believes that the farmer in Ohio during the harvest season can expect to hire men for less than $80 a month and board for just a month and a half, when they are not hired by the season?

Mr. POMERENE. For $80 a month?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Unquestionably, he can.

Mr. McCUMBER. Those are the figures that I gave a short time ago, and it would be worth $20 a month to board that man, would it not?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there are mighty few men in Ohio who are getting $80 per month on the farm.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mighty few farmers; yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mighty few men on the farm—I mean, farm hands.

Mr. McCUMBER. Possibly the Senator misunderstood me, or I misunderstood him.

Mr. POMERENE. Possibly I did.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I am asking the Senator is whether or not, in his opinion, during the busiest season of the year, while the farmer is harvesting his crop of wheat, he could this year engage men to work for a month and a half during harvest season for less than $80 a month and board?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in the first place, the wheat harvest season does not last in Ohio on any farm for a month. If it lasts two weeks on a given farm, that is the extreme.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does that include the thrashing?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, harvesting as it is generally understood consists not only in cutting the grain, but in caring for it and thrashing it. I include in my question the time during the harvesting and the thrashing seasons.

Mr. POMERENE. I must say—and I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator—that I think he has his figures entirely too high. I am not able to give him the exact figures, because I have not lately inquired.

Mr. President, just one other observation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to say to him that I know, as a matter of fact, that we have to pay our men $90 a month now, and we are unable to get all the men we want at that price.

Mr. POMERENE. I accept the Senator's statement. If he makes that statement, I accept it as correct.

Now, Mr. President, there is another proposition to which I want to refer for just a minute.

It has been stated that unless the price of wheat is raised farmers will sow barley or rye or oats instead. I suppose some of them will, but that does not alarm me very much, assuming it to be so, because all those cereals are now used for food purposes, and, so, if we did lose some wheat, we would perhaps gain in oats and rye and barley. The winter wheat, of course, is sown. The spring wheat is to be sown. I can speculate quite as well as other Senators as to whether or not there is going to be a substantial shrinkage in the amount of acreage which will be sown because of the fact that the price is only $2.20 a bushel; but that is guesswork.

I am informed by a gentleman whom I believe to be well posted upon this subject that an analysis of the spring planting of wheat would show that the only expansion in area which would be obtained by a higher price would be in the arid regions, and that the area of expansion has a maximum of probably not over 4,000,000 acres.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, those figures are interesting; but I want to ask the Senator now——

Mr. POMERENE. Will not the Senator wait until I finish reading this paragraph, please?

Mr. REED. Oh, certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. At its average yield this would be, at the outside, 60,000,000 bushels of wheat—that is, the average of 15 bushels per acre. For this quantity of wheat it is proposed that the country should pay 50 cents a bushel bonus on the entire crop of, say, 750,000,000 bushels.

In other words, to encourage the raising of 60,000,000 bushels we want the consumer to be taxed at the rate of 50 cents per bushel on the entire crop of 750,000,000 bushels, or we would pay $375,000,000 in order to encourage the production of 60,000,000 bushels of wheat.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. REED. I wanted to ask who is the author of that statement that the only place where you can expand spring-wheat production is in the arid regions?

Mr. POMERENE. I may say that he is one of the best-informed men in this city on this subject. I am not at liberty to give his name now. I should be very glad to give it if I were.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say that Iowa is a spring-wheat State, and that the contest in Iowa is between corn and wheat and hay and oats. I wonder if the author of these figures means to say that if wheat was a more profitable crop than corn or rye there would not be room for plenty of expansion in a State like Iowa, or a State like Minnesota, or a State like Missouri, or a State like Ohio?

It seems to me that the statement that there is no place for an expansion of the spring-wheat crop except in the arid regions could only have been made by a man who never saw a farm.

Mr. POMERENE. I assume that this is a general statement, and I do not assume that he has gone to the very acre. He has given this as the outside of expansion which would be encouraged by this increase in price. He does not say that there would not be other wheat in the arid regions, but he says the outside maximum of expansion would be 4,000,000 acres.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, does not the Senator think it is just as important to keep in the winter-wheat acreage already sown where the yield threatens to be low and unprofitable on a basis of $2.20 a bushel?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that is one of those questions which can not be answered unless you have some further facts. If the acreage would promise a 5 per cent yield, the answer would be one thing; if it promises a 10 per cent yield, the answer might be another thing; if it promises a 25 or 50 per cent yield, another.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, just one further point. Whoever prepared the figures for the Senator seems to proceed on the theory that this bill proposes an increase of 50 cents a bushel. The Senator is aware, is he not, that the President has already issued a proposition——

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, that is being contrasted with the present law on the subject, and not with the present Executive order.

Mr. GORE. The President found it necessary to raise the price 20 cents a bushel.

Mr. POMERENE. He did.

Mr. GORE. And this proposal is to raise it only 30 cents more.

Mr. POMERENE. As between the price fixed by the President and the price fixed by this amendment, if it should be adopted, there is only a difference of 30 cents a bushel.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. That, of course, must be taken into consideration.

Mr. President, I have taken very much more time than I intended to take; but I feel that I would be doing a thing which is not asked by the farmers of my State, and which is contrary to the interests of the public generally, if I were to vote in favor of this increase of the minimum price.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator is, of course, aware that rye is now selling at $3 and as high as $3.38?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, it has advanced in price. I do not know what the present figure is; but it seems to me it simply demonstrates the correctness of my position, that when we are fixing the price of the one cereal we ought to fix the price of the competing cereals.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator think if you reduce the market price of rye the Government ought to take the loss instead of obliging the producer to take the loss?

Mr. POMERENE. We are talking about the future now. We are speaking about fixing the minimum price. If we are to fix the minimum price for rye, are you taking anything from the farmer?

Mr. GORE. There would not be any controversy between the Senator and myself or anyone who thinks as I think if this was a minimum price. It is not a minimum price, and I ask the Senator to take the judgment of farmers in Nebraska and the Dakotas and in Kansas last year who were obliged to sell their wheat for 80 cents less than it was worth in the market, and out of the diminished proceeds we propose to make those farmers stand guarantor, and we guarantee the Burlington Railroad 26 per cent return on its capital stock, and if the Burlington is not satisfied with that 26 per cent it has a right to go into the courts. If the Senator thinks that is just and equal rights to all——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there are certain people who think they have a right to charge for any of the necessities of life what they can get. I do not.

Mr. GORE. What does the Senator think the farmer has a right to get for what he raises?

Mr. POMERENE. In a time of war a man has a right to a reasonable price, and has not any right to charge the public these enormous prices. I care not whether he is an iron producer, a copper man, a cotton planter, or a wheat farmer.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator think you can stimulate production by fixing the price on an article at less than the law of supply and demand would award?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, there comes supply and demand again. We always get back to that.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is in favor of repealing that law?

Mr. POMERENE. That is a very learned question to ask.

Mr. GORE. It ought to be very easily answered.

Mr. POMERENE. If you will so adjust conditions here in this country that the law of supply and demand will operate, I am in favor of the law of supply and demand, but in these products it has not been operating for more than a year, many economists to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. GORE. Do I understand the Senator to say if the law of supply and demand would oblige the farmer to take less than $2.20 a bushel for his wheat he would be in favor of the law, but if the law would give more than $2.20 he is opposed to its operation?

Mr. POMERENE. The law of supply and demand is not controlling this situation.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator, then, what is controlling rye and corn and barley?

Mr. POMERENE. Because it is largely in the hands of those who can boost prices, and they are boosting prices, and because of failure to get needed transportation.

Mr. GORE. Is the Senator aware that corn is largely in the hands of the farmers; that it has not been moving even normally; that according to the normal movement there ought to have been during the last few weeks 80,000,000 bushels of corn in the elevators, and there are only about 4,000,000 bushels?

Mr. POMERENE. I got through discussing that a while ago. I made the statement that the increased price of corn, as I had been reliably informed, was due to lack of transportation. The supply was not where it could be had. The supply was not at the point of consumption; the supply was still in the hands of the producer, and he could not get it to market. Now, does the Senator think that when the product is in the hands of the producer and he can not get it to the consumer it is still the law of supply and demand that regulates it generally throughout the country?

Mr. GORE. I remember distinctly the statement of the Senator to that effect, and I was tempted to bring up against it his later statement that the reason why the price of corn and rye is so high is that they are in the hands of people who are trying to boost the price. I could not reconcile the two statements.

Mr. REED. In this connection I wish to ask the Senator if he thinks that corn and rye and barley in Canada are in the hands of those who are trying to boost prices?

Mr. POMERENE. It so happens that they do not raise very much corn in Canada.

Mr. REED. But corn has a market in Canada and rye and barley have a market there, and the prices of corn and rye and barley in Canada are the identical prices in the United States, subject to the differences which naturally occur in the matter of freight.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not looked into the question of the price of barley and rye in Canada, and I know nothing about it.

Mr. REED. I have. I have looked it up.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; then I suppose we will hear about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] for just a moment. I have listened to the patriotic sentiments of the Senator from Ohio. I have always been struck by the fairness of his utterances, and my admiration for his courage in dealing with all matters has been very great indeed. I confess I was somewhat abashed and chagrined when I listened to the first statement made by the Senator from Ohio, after having given him some figures which I asked if he would kindly reply to. I left my seat and went over to see the Senator, just before giving my figures, and asked him the average price of good farm lands in the State of Ohio, and he told me they would run from $100 to $150 an acre. I asked him if $125 per acre would be a fair estimate, and he said he thought it would in the good grain-raising section of Ohio. I then based my estimates upon the figures that were given by the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from Ohio, when he started to reply, used this language:

> Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the statement made by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] save and except to say that I neither agree with his premises, his conclusions, nor his process of reasoning.

Upon any ordinary question of fact, Mr. President, I could have the Senator from Ohio make that statement without any feeling upon my part, if it was a question on which minds might naturally differ, but I dislike to have the Senator say he does not agree with my premises after I have received my premises from his own lips. I dislike to have the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator, because I want to be perfectly fair with him.

Mr. POMERENE. I certainly did not mean any offense. The only premise that the Senator got from my lips was the one as to the price of land. Is not that right?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true, and that is the premise upon which I based all the other calculations which the Senator from Ohio challenged.

Mr. President, the Senator also disagreed with my conclusions. I regret that my probity is such that the Senator will deny, if the expression comes from my lips, the natural rules of mathematics. When I conclude that 160 acres of land at $125 an acre will amount to $20,000 I am more than surprised to have the Senator question it, because it is one of mathematical deduction only, and when I also compute 6 per cent interest on $25,000——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment—and arrive at the conclusion that that means $1,500. I am confounded when I listen to the Senator's statement that he denies my conclusion. I thought 6 per cent upon $25,000 did really amount to $1,500 per annum. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Has not the Senator overlooked the possibility that the principles and axioms and rules of mathematics have gone glimmering with the law of supply and demand like a schoolboy's dream?

Mr. McCUMBER. They have gone somewhere. I have not been able to chase them down, and I am not assisted very much by my genial friend from Ohio.

Now, that is not the only conclusion. The Senator says:

> If the Standard Oil Co. would employ him as an accountant, I am sure there would be no income tax to pay by that company.

My colleague a short time ago gave a little of the method of accounting which I suppose would be adopted by the Standard Oil Co. in arriving at what was a reasonable profit for those who convert our cattle into food products. After allowing them what we would call most fabulous salaries upon the farm, after allowing them all expenses, they were allowed, I think, 9 or 10 per cent profit above that upon everything that they had made in all the years, and which they had added to their original plant in the shape of surplus; and when it came to the by-products they were allowed 15 per cent upon the capital invested in the by-products.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator is speaking of packing houses?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking of packing houses.

Mr. REED. The Senator is for once slightly in error.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not want to exaggerate. I am very careful about it.

Mr. REED. The Senator is not exaggerating.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am keeping within conservative lines.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me if I call his attention to the rule that is laid down in the circular sent out by the Food Administration under the date of November 24?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for a question, if the Senator can put it in that form. I do not wish to lose the floor, because I desire to close in just a few minutes.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator will want this. The statement is:

After investigation and consideration, it has been determined to permit the packers (except the five large packers, whom we shall speak of in a moment) to earn an annual profit equal to 2.5 per cent of their total annual sales. This profit is to be net after expenses are paid; interest on money borrowed will be treated as an expense, but not Federal taxes, which the packer must pay himself out of his profits. Regulations will be so drawn.

That is, as to the smaller packers. Now, coming to the larger ones:

The five large packers stand in a different class. They have important and vital service to perform for the National Government in this war. Upon them rests the burden of preparing the bulk of the meat-food products which our allies and our armies require. They must become national agencies for war service. They are, with such help as we will require from the smaller packers, to be called on, month by month, for whatever meat products may be required at prices and in quantities approved by this division. For the reasons thus stated, and no others, it has been determined to treat these five concerns as a separate class.

Now I give the Senator the rule as to them:

After full consideration it has been determined that the meat business of the large packers will be subject, first, to the same restriction as the small packers—that is, 2½ per cent on sales—and, second, to a further and additional restriction: That the total annual earnings of the large packer from his "meat business" shall be limited to 9 per cent on his average capital necessarily used by him in that business, including borrowed capital. This profit is to be net after expenses are paid, but United States taxes, interest on bonds and borrowed money, and dividends may not be treated as expenses, but must be paid by the packer out of this profit. If, however, the rate paid on borrowed money be over 5 per cent, such excess will be treated as an expense.

What I am calling the Senator's attention to is this, that the 9 per cent is not figured upon the bonded indebtedness plus the capital stock, but it is figured upon all the money which may be invested in the business, including borrowed money—and most concerns have invested in their business several times their capital stock. So they get 9 per cent upon all of it, and if their interest is 5 per cent they are bound to make 4 per cent the difference between that and 9 per cent. As I estimate roughly they will probably make from 20 to 40 per cent. In addition to that, when the companies make a by-product, they get a larger amount, being allowed 15 per cent upon that capital.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator for his contribution. I simply wish to say to my friend from Ohio that the farmers are not receiving the treatment that was suggested by him would be given to them by an accountant for the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Ohio will deny that it requires about $1 an acre per year for fertilizer in Ohio. I thought I was overly conservative, because I had asked some one else and they had stated it at about $2 per acre per year. Then I think he will not say that I exaggerate the figures when I say that the taxes on all the property owned by a farmer on a farm of 160 acres in the State of Ohio, with all the farm machinery upon it, would probably be about $100 a year. I would rather the Senator would have corrected me and shown wherein I was in error rather than to make the sweeping charge that he had no confidence in any of the figures that I might see fit to present on the subject.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, the Senator ought to be fair with me. I did not say that I did not accept any of the figures. I said I did not agree with his conclusion, and what I intended by the conclusion was that he had a family on a 160-acre farm not making any money, and, as I remember, if they were not in debt, at least they had nothing on the profit side of the ledger. That is what I intended.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I gave my figures, and if the figures were in error I think the Senator should have attempted to correct the figures, because I desired to be absolutely accurate. I showed that at $2 a bushel, allowing the farmer 6 per cent interest on his investment and giving him farm labor very much cheaper than my colleague says can possibly be obtained in our State, he would have at the end of the year, for his whole family about $300, which would be equivalent in a family of five to $60 a year, $5 a month, or an average earning capacity of 20 cents a day, on $2 wheat.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not care to get into any controversy with the Senator on this subject. I am simply going to refer to a fact or two to show how manifestly unfair his premises are. In Ohio, for instance, on farms that are valued at $125 an acre it is a very rare case where land of that kind produces only 14 bushels to the acre. There is another thing.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to touch on that in just a minute.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply want to add this: There are many other things. We rotate our crops in Ohio constantly. After the wheat crop is sown we sow timothy or clover in the wheat. Usually in the fall the farmers pasture the growing clover for a month or two. The Senator takes no account of that.

When it comes to the fertilizers, a large part of the fertilizers is produced upon the farm. The Senator takes no account of that. We have our corn, our oats, sometimes our rye, and our potatoes; we raise our stock, and so forth. Wheat is not the only crop; it is only one of three or four principal crops that are raised. So no man can take the figures, with all due respect to the Senator—and I meant no reflection upon him—which are presented by the Senator and get any exact estimate as to the amount which will be earned upon one of these farms.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is mistaken when he says I do not take into account all of those things—I do take them into account—but I am now particularly taking into account the question of raising wheat, because that is the only thing we are discussing in this bill.

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. When the farmer sows his land to timothy he is not raising wheat that year; when he is raising corn he is not raising wheat that year. After all, no matter whether in the Senator's State the farmers rotate the crops or not, they can raise but one crop a year upon the land. We will allow those other crops to take care of themselves, and we will allow them to take care of the fertilization for the next year, but this year we are asked to sow wheat, irrespective of what was on the land last year.

The Senator from Ohio has been so led astray by his enthusiasm in defense of the washerwoman of whom he has spoken so pathetically that he has not given us a fair statement of the average yield of wheat in Ohio. Let me again quote what the Senator said. He said:

I want only to allude to one particular fact. When he—speaks of the average crop of wheat in Ohio as being 14 bushels an acre, I hope my friend knows more about farming in North Dakota than he does about farming in Ohio. The average production in Ohio is ordinarily about 23 to 25 bushels an acre. Last year in many sections 40 bushels an acre was not an uncommon yield—

Referring to me—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I am afraid either that the Senator from Ohio is in error in his statement or else that I really do not know more about farming both in Ohio and in North Dakota than does the Senator from Ohio. When he made the statement concerning the yield of wheat in Ohio, I confess I was startled, because, representing an agricultural State, I generally keep pretty accurate information of the yield of wheat in every State in the Union, and the figures that I gave were those of the average yield for 10 years throughout the United States. The average yield in the United States is about 14 bushels per acre. Therefore I took that as my basis. In North Dakota, taking the last 10 years, the average yield was 12.2 bushels per acre. The Senator stated that in Ohio the yield is from 23 to 25 bushels an acre. I immediately sent over to my office for the Yearbook of Agriculture for 1916, and taking the average in Ohio for 10 years—from 1907 to 1916, inclusive—the yield was shown to be 15.9 bushels per acre. Very little, indeed, over what my estimate was for the entire United States. I am surprised to have the Senator from Ohio, who has lived in Ohio so many years, and who so ably represents that State, criticize my estimate of the yield of wheat for the United States and claim that Ohio raises from 23 to 25 bushels per acre, when the agricultural statistics show that she raises on an average but 15.9 bushels an acre. If Ohio averages in her yield of wheat what the Senator says she averages, I would not be surprised if he should think that $2 a bushel would be an exorbitant price for wheat, but she does not raise that amount of wheat, and the figures that I have given in my estimate are substantially correct.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 20, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 19, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, strengthen every fiber of our being and help us to concentrate our thought and energy on the successful prosecution of the war which we have entered in behalf of human liberty and human rights. Encourage us by the great truth that right reenforced by wisdom, integrity, courage, and imperishable faith in Thee, the living God, is the greatest force vouchsafed to man.

Hear us, O God our Father, and grant speedy success to our arms, for the sake of humanity, in His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House joint resolution No. 154.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on House joint resolution No. 154. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as it was agreed that we should have an hour's debate this morning, I do not think it is fair to curtail that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN H. CAPSTICK, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join a committee appointed by the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing resolution the Vice President had appointed the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] as the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. FRANCE and Mr. HOLLIS members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Labor.

The message also announced that the President had, on March 18, 1918, approved and signed bill of the following title:

S. 3471. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to grant furloughs without pay and allowances to enlisted men of the Army of the United States.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for two weeks, on account of illness.

INDUSTRIAL CREDITS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10608) known as the war corporation finance bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10608, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10608) to provide further for the national security and defense and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I really ought not to undertake to speak, for I have not been very well and my throat is bothering me a lot, yet I feel I ought to say a word about the pending bill.

We are living in an extraordinary period, and we are required to do extraordinary things. The pending bill, known as the war-finance corporation bill, is one of the radical pieces of legislation that has been submitted to the consideration of Congress, and I confess when it was first submitted it amazed me. But I realize, after careful study of the problems involved, that we are called upon to do many things during this war period that we would not even have stopped to consider for a moment in times of peace.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I venture the suggestion, if the gentleman will permit, that when this bill was first submitted nine men out of ten were astounded at the suggestion of such legislation, and that if they had been called upon right at that moment nine out of ten would have voted against it, and I think to-day probably nine out of ten are in favor of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree with the gentleman from Texas. It is a radical departure from the ordinary movements of Government in times of peace. But we are in a period of war, and everything we do is radical and must of necessity be radical. And the main object of the Government and the people of the United States during this war period must be the winning of the war, and anything that will aid in the accomplishment of that purpose must be done.

There ought not to be any hesitation about it. This bill, when it first came to the light, proposed, as it does to-day, the organization of a corporation with $500,000,000 of capital, to be furnished from the Treasury of the United States, and the right to issue securities amounting to $4,000,000,000 more, to be managed by the Secretary of the Treasury in fact, although in name it was proposed to associate with him four other gentlemen, called a board, over which board he was to preside. He was to have the power to name the board, to discharge it, and to veto anything that it might do. That seemed to be radical. I was pleasantly surprised upon consultation with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and other members of the committee, both Democrat and Republican, to find that they did not agree that such a radical course should be pursued. In the course of the consideration of the bill before the Committee on Ways and Means I had the privilege of appearing, and I made two or three suggestions which I may reiterate.

I thought that instead of the Secretary of the Treasury having the power to name a board to manage this great corporation, the Federal reserve banks, the regional banks, ought to have the power to either name or nominate to the President the men who were to act as the board of directors, and the reason why I thought that should be so is that the capital of the regional banks, amounting to $72,000,000, is all furnished by the member banks, and the members furnishing the directors of the regional banks, and that these national banks have on deposit in the regional banks about $1,500,000,000, on which they draw no interest; and they, it seemed to me, would be sufficiently interested in the proper management of the corporation provided for in this bill to see that no improper loans were made.

I feared that with the enormous weight of duty imposed upon the Secretary of the Treasury through the manifold positions that he occupies he would not be able to give the consideration to the problems involved in the operations of this corporation that their importance entitle them to. And I also thought, and still think, that there should be advisory boards elected by the regional banks, to pass upon the applications for loans through this corporation, originating within the region, and that the board itself should be limited in its power to make such loans as might be recommended by the regional boards—the advisory boards. The purpose of my suggestion was to furnish the board that takes final action the specific information as to the validity and the justice of the claims for assistance. I realize that some such legislation as this must be enacted, and I also realize that it should be surrounded by every safeguard possible.

The Ways and Means Committee entered upon the consideration of this bill with the determination so to amend it that it would, when reported to the House, come as nearly as possible to meeting the expectations of the business public. The only justification, the real justification, for the enactment of the law is that the Government itself has absorbed all of the financial life of the country, if I may so speak, in the sale of its liberty bonds, and that has made it almost, if not quite, impossible for the banks themselves to furnish the needed help to industrial enterprises. And so the Government having taken the place of the financial institutions of the country and absorbed all the loaning power of the country, it seemed that there might be danger of destroying a great many business activities unless the Government itself came to the rescue. And so the thought was suggested that this corporation might fill that place.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like to know the gentleman's opinion, as a practical business man, as to the wisdom of having the Secretary of the Treasury a part of this board at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, it seems to me you could not permit any board to be organized to manage a great corporation like this, where its activities must in a large sense coordinate with the Treasury of the United States, without the Secretary of the Treasury in a sense being the guiding spirit. Everything that this corporation does must be done in harmony with the policy of the Treasury of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury, being the responsible Government official to direct the movements of the Treasury, he must of necessity be a member of this board, not having the veto power over the actions of the board except in cases where their action might conflict with the policy of the department. In that case he ought to have the veto power.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does not that mean, in essence, that the board will be simply advisory to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. MADDEN. Not necessarily. The board, as I proposed it, should either have been elected by the regional banks, or nominated by such banks to the President for submission to the Senate for confirmation, and I suggested that there should be 12 members of the board, or 13 including the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman offer that amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the committee has fairly met that suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then that suggestion is out of the question?

Mr. MADDEN. No. I think they have met the suggestion under the circumstances fairly. I suggested that they ought to have a board of 12, with the Secretary as ex officio chairman; that the 12 members should be elected by the regional bank directors, or that they should be nominated by the President to the Senate and confirmed by the Senate. That would make the board absolutely independent of the Secretary of the Treasury. But I believe, from the way in which the Ways and Means Committee have provided for the selection of the board, they will be independent of the Secretary of the Treasury except in cases where the Secretary of the Treasury should decide whether what they do conflicts with the policy of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, for instance, the interest rate of these securities—the Secretary of the Treasury ought to supervise that. Otherwise it might be dangerous competition with the bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Take this situation: The Secretary of the Treasury is chairman of the board. All well and good. Everything that is to be done can be done by the three of the five members with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; the gentleman is quite wrong. That applies only to one particular section of the bill. In every other part of the bill it is a majority of the board, without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MEEKER. Well, then, on the issuance of this stock the president of the board, the Secretary of the Treasury, must act on that, must he not?

Mr. MADDEN. There will be only one certificate of stock.

Mr. MEEKER. On the amount of money paid in. The Secretary of the Treasury, who is chairman of the board, passes on that, and then reports back to himself as to the amount paid in.

Mr. MADDEN. He reports to the board. The board is an independent entity. The Secretary of the Treasury, as such, has nothing to do with this board except to veto any action taken by the board that will conflict with the policy of the department, as in the case suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. MEEKER. While acting on the board he is Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true; but the two functions are distinct and apart, and the obligations of the Secretary of the Treasury, as such, have no relation whatever to the chairman of this board, as such. One of the great dangers in the organization of this corporation, as I saw at the beginning—and it still may exist—is that when the corporation commences to do business it will find itself compelled to issue securities, perhaps bonds—short-time bonds. These bonds, perhaps, will be handed over to those who need financial help.

They in turn will go to the banks, member banks of the Federal reserve, and they will borrow money on the bonds, and later on these member banks will be obliged to go to the regional banks to borrow money, and they will make their own paper, no doubt, and they will furnish the bonds of this corporation as security for the paper which they themselves make, and upon that paper, rediscounted, backed up by the collateral of this corporation, the Federal reserve banks of the United States may find themselves issuing new notes. Now, to guard against the possibility of issuing too large a number of notes on the security which this corporation will supply, the Ways and Means Committee have provided that there shall be a 1 per cent additional charge for any loan made or currency issued by the regional banks upon the security of this corporation.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, on that point will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that 1 per cent is too high?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. There has been some controversy about that.

Mr. MADDEN. The important thing is to protect the integrity of the Federal reserve banks, and the charge of 1 per cent interest over that prevailing on ordinary rediscounts will help to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask for five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret that I will not have the time to extend the gentleman's time.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that an additional five minutes be taken out of no one's time and given to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. It will no doubt be argued that the creation of this corporation, with authority to issue securities and make loans amounting to $4,500,000,000, will result in an expansion of credit which must prove dangerous to the business structure of the country. But when we consider the fact that the Government is monopolizing the finances of the country by the sale of liberty bonds, it will be apparent that since it has closed the doors of the banks to many deserving enterprises needing financial assistance it must in justice to these enterprises come to their aid if they are to continue to do business, and this is especially true if the business is one producing war material. We must not forget that the war is now the most important activity of the Government, to win which all our energies, financial and otherwise, must be exerted.

The savings banks find their deposits falling by the withdrawal of funds for the purchase of liberty bonds. These banks have good securities in their vaults for which there is now no market, and this corporation will have authority to loan them its bonds, taking the notes of the banks secured by such collateral as they have, on the basis of $1.33 of value for every dollar advanced. The savings banks would thus be able to go to the national banks, members of the Federal reserve banks, and borrow on the bonds of this corporation. The national banks could, in turn, go to the regional reserve banks and rediscount their notes with the corporation bonds as collateral and secure regional notes to meet the demands of business. But why not give the Federal reserve banks authority to do what it is proposed to do through this corporation, since it seems the Federal reserve banks are to be permitted to issue notes for circulation against the nonliquid paper of the war-finance corporation.

The answer must be obvious. This corporation is authorized to make direct loans to needy, deserving business concerns whose activities are essential to the successful prosecution of the war. That relief could not be granted through the Federal Reserve System. It is proposed that the war finance corporation shall make advances to banks or bankers who have loans outstanding to corporations doing a war business—that is, a business which is being conducted for the purpose of aiding in the prosecution of the war. But advances made to such banks can not exceed 75 per cent of the face value of such loans, and must be secured by the note of the bank, supplemented by such security as the bank holds as the basis for the advance. The war finance corporation is authorized to buy, sell, and deal in bonds of the United States—the purpose being to stabalize the market on liberty bonds and other obligations of the United States.

There are many important phases of this bill which I should like to discuss, but the time allotted me will not permit. I shall, therefore, conclude by calling the attention of the House to the fact that the first draft of the bill conferred the power on the board to license every business in the country and prevented the issue of securities in excess of $100,000 by any corporation without express authority of this board. That has been changed to provide for the creation of a capital-issues committee, whose duty it will be to pass on the question of whether security issues by private corporations in excess of $100,000 is compatible with the public interest during the war.

The committee has no power, however, to prevent such security issues, but it is believed its advice and counsel will have great weight in preventing the use of capital in industries that have not part in fighting the war. Extraordinary as the legislation is, so far afield from what one would consider sane and safe finance in times of peace, I am bound to believe that conditions created by the war may call for just such financial assistance as this legislation is intended to afford, and I give it my sanction because I wish nothing to be left undone to insure the success of our armies and the preservation of the country's business integrity. I hope the President will select men of ability and experience to administer the law, and that each man selected will do his best to meet the needs of the hour by devoting himself to his task with an eye single to the country's prestige at home and abroad.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am persuaded that the question asked by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] as to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury in the administration of this law was inspired by his desire, as expressed in the hearings, in which the Secretary of the Treasury made this quite remarkable statement——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. On what page?

Mr. FESS. On page 76. He said:

> I have great respect for boards and commissions. In peace times I think they are very desirable things. In war times I do not know of anything that is less desirable.

Further down on the same page, in illustrating his desire to be not interrupted by having a divided responsibility, he uses his own position as Secretary of the Treasury to illustrate it. He says:

> Now, take the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury to illustrate the point. There are five splendid men who are Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury. I do not know of a finer spirit than those men exhibit. They will work all night and all day and go no limit to help out and do the job. There is perfect harmony, and we all get along splendidly. I have my conferences with them, and we sit down and talk things over, and we decide upon a policy, and everybody gets busy and puts it through. I imagine, though, that if the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury were not my subordinates, so that they would have to accept my decision, I might find it very much more difficult to get quick action, because very frequently when men all have an equal vote they are more tenacious of opinion and more willing to assert it.

An opinion of the necessity of absolute control of this proposed corporation by the Secretary of the Treasury could not be more clearly expressed. It leaves no doubt in any mind on that point.

That evidently was the thing that was in the minds of those who have been concerned over the question of control.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is that the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that it is. I have read from the hearings the Secretary's own words.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvaina. Does the gentleman object to my reading in that connection the reply paragraph of the bill which pertains to that point?

Mr. FESS. I will ask my friend not to insist on it now, since my time is so limited.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the committee have corrected it.

Mr. FESS. I will state frankly that the committee have corrected that. And may I say this, too——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We depended on these hearings for information.

Mr. FESS. May I say that I felicitate this House upon the position of the Committee on Ways and Means in refusing to follow the sickly, sickening servility that has been manifested in so many committees in the House in the last few years? [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I add in that connection that in the original bill the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury" appeared seventeen times? The committee cut out those words in all except three cases, where we thought they were necessary on account of the broad governmental policy that ought to be pursued as between the two functions of the Government.

Mr. FESS. The committee has displayed a healthful attitude in respect to its function as a committee of a legislative body. The tendency in recent years to await the orders of a department, organically coordinate but rapidly becoming the head of legislation, as well as the executive, can have but one result if allowed to run its course uninterrupted.

The bill as it appears now, compared with what it was when it came from the Treasury Department, bears the mark of a real legislative committee. It is shorn of many symptoms of bureaucratic government.

The observation of my colleague, Mr. LONGWORTH, a member of the committee, is another evidence of the independence of the committee in doing their own thinking and not taking orders. I am intent on this, that the House is in danger of a state of atrophy if it does not exercise its right to initiate legislation and leave it to the Executive to sign or to veto it, which is his proper function, and not to initiate it. This is a splendid display of that independence, and I congratulate the committee. As I said before, I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of this legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One question.

Mr. FESS. I have only a little time, and I had hoped to have an hour on this subject. Some of the statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury and also by Mr. Warburg when they officially informed the committee of the needs of this legislation have aroused tremendous suspicion in my mind; and I admit that although recognizing the emergent condition that faces us in war, I was greatly disturbed as to what this legislation might mean in the minds of the men who proposed it. I do not refer to the committee but to the Treasury officials. When we raise the question, as it has been raised throughout the country, of the danger of inflation, I do not mean expansion of the currency but inflation of credit which is identical with inflation of the currency in its effect. We are assured that no danger can come from that source. If you inflate credit you have an abnormal price of goods on sale just as you would have if you inflate the currency of the country. Such movement is an increase in price but not an increase in value, and in the nature of the case such artificial price current must be a serious condition financially when the country goes upon an inflated basis, whether you express it in currency or in credit. There must not be a confusion here by attempting to differentiate where there is no distinction. When the question was asked in the Committee on Ways and Means, the Secretary of the Treasury made the statement that there would not be any inflation. He said:

> There has been some criticism of the bill on the idea that in some way or other there will be currency inflation. Any idea of currency inflation must result from a misconception as to the bonds issued by the corporation, for there is no danger that such securities will cause inflation through an undue expansion of the circulating medium of the country.

Here is his assurance against the inflation of the circulating medium which is no assurance against the same result under another terminology.

In another place the Secretary of the Treasury says that this proposed legislation is to prevent inflation that otherwise would come if we did not have some legislation of this sort. The Secretary of the Treasury may be correct to the letter when he says it will not inflate the currency. Technically that may be true, but certainly no such assurance can come from the bill itself. I do not believe that there will be any surer results than a great expansion of the currency. While he says that you can not take these bonds and directly convert them into Treasury notes or Federal reserve notes, he does not say that you can not do it indirectly by allowing the banks to take the bonds, and then take the credit of the bank to the Federal reserve, and thereby convert it into Federal reserve notes. Now, that is an inflation of the currency. We are assured that the corporation bonds have no circulatory function. True, but the credit represented by them can indirectly be converted into circulating notes.

This is conceded by the requirement to charge a penalty of an additional 1 per cent to discourage the transaction and also to hasten their retirement.

I am confident in my own mind that this proposal will furnish the basis for a vast increase of our circulation.

It is not enough to say they will not be issued. The supreme question is, Can they be issued? They can be and in war time they will be issued.

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman from Ohio will yield, I have an important statement to make. Is the gentleman aware that he is specially favored, not only by the attendance here in the Chamber but an audience in the gallery the superior of which seldom appears in an American auditorium. [Applause.] I refer to several hundred splendid young American engineers of the One hundred and twenty-third who have come from Laurel this morning to visit the House of Representatives, to honor the gentleman who is addressing us, and to honor this body with their presence. It is especially fitting that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], one of America's leading educators and statesmen, should speak in the hearing of the young militant manhood of whom all are school men and 75 per cent are college men.

To the young men of the One hundred and twenty-third United States Engineers, many of whom "have come out of the West," permit me to say that the debate to which you have listened was upon the most gigantic financial war measure ever considered by Congress or Parliament. It is designed to aid the business of the country so that your arms and those of your million comrades may be sustained in the mighty world conflict. Your technical learning and skill will be a great factor in the fight. We know you will do your part. We are trying to do ours. Your purposes and ours merge into a unit to inspire friends and dismay all who would stand against our national will. You are all clean, brave, estimable, gallant young Americans, who will prepare the way for the boys in the multiplied thousands to go over the top in France, where many of you soon expect to be. We wish you Godspeed. We bespeak victory. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. It is fitting that Mr. SLOAN, a distinguished member of the committee which has charge of this measure, has called attention to the presence of these sons who have come to the colors. It but intensifies the country's situation which calls upon the Congress to enact war legislation such as we are now considering and such as has held this Congress for more than a year of intensive preparation. To you young men we give a Nation's devotion, for we well know you are offering a costly sacrifice if necessary for her honor, and safety.

Now, if I may have the attention of the committee, I had hoped to have something to say that would invite the closest attention of the Members of this House. While it may be true—which I will not admit—that there is no inflation of the currency in this bill, nobody would think of saying that there is no inflation of credits in the bill. And in the last analysis inflation of credits is inflation of the currency, for you can not separate them. The truth about the matter is that any attempt to finance this war outside of the income of the Nation as measured in the savings of her people represents inflation. We have only two ways to utilize the income in the prosecution of the war. Our income is variously estimated at from $40,000,000,000 to $50,000,000,000 annually. Probably our savings will not reach more than $6,000,000,000, but that is because we are wasteful.

Mr. MADDEN. Our average savings are $4,000,000,000.

Mr. FESS. They ought to reach many times that.

Mr. MADDEN. No; they could not do that.

Mr. FESS. And what we should do is to finance the war through the real wealth of the country as it is found in the hands of the citizens of the country. One way is to do it by taxation. All will admit that such a war as we now face can not be financed by taxation alone. Another way is to do it by taking the earnings of the people through the form of loans in the issuance of Government bonds. Taxation has reached the annual sum of $2,500,000,000, which is pretty high. Loans probably will reach $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000. The cost of the war, on the other hand, will reach a figure double the sum of the two sources—tax and loans—and the difference between the cost of the war and the money that is raised either by taxation or loans must measure the amount of credit that we must create, and which is proposed to be extended when this bill becomes a law. Here is the danger: When you undertake to do business by borrowing from banks instead of borrowing from individuals, just in that degree you undertake to lend by borrowing, and that is always a dangerous proposition unless within paying ability. It is precisely what we do if I go to the bank and say to my bank, "I want $1,000 of a loan that I wish to invest in liberty bonds." The Government lets me have the bonds. I turn the bonds over to the bank as collateral security for the money I borrow from the bank. I, of course, give my note to the bank. Here are two credits. The one is the Government giving its credit to me because I give it the money that I borrow from the bank, and the other is the bank loaning me the money which I must some day pay out of my earnings. Now, if I do not save and pay the bank, you have still got two sources of credit there piling one on the other. Is it possible?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Since the gentleman's speech was interrupted, I yield to him two minutes more.

Mr. FESS. This transaction by which I borrow in order to lend is one of the chief incidents of expanded credit. If bonds are purchased by the banks instead of by the individuals, it is expanding credit.

I am persuaded much of this was done in the last liberty loan campaign. Many of these bank notes remain still unpaid, which of itself will prove a deterrent in the next loan campaign.

I want to announce one or two principles as principles of sound finance which must not be lost sight of even in time of war. If the production of the country runs behind the credit of the country, then you have inflation. If the service and the goods that are sold in the form of labor and products of labor keep pace with the credit of the country, there is no inflation. But if credit runs ahead of that stage to that degree, it is inflated. I admit that in war times it is probably impossible to keep the two things together, and therefore inflation of credit is almost inevitable in a time of war. That being the case there is bound to be abnormal prices, as is so apparent to us all. To-day we are in an inflated era. People speak about the amount of interest demanded. People are demanding more interest, which is invariably the case in war times, and that is only a measure of inflation, and whenever you disturb the relationship between the circulating medium and the goods to be exchanged in the market by increasing the volume of the purchasing power without increasing the real purchasing power, you thereby decrease the net purchasing power, and in that case you have inflation. By increasing the volume of the measuring units, you decrease the purchasing power of the unit.

Mr. Chairman, we here propose a bill the ostensible and openly avowed purpose of which is to expand our credits. We do it at the end of the first year of the war.

England did the same thing, only in a different way. It is true all Europe has long ago gone on a paper basis, which took off all restraints of expansion.

On December 13, 1917, a special committee of the Treasury appointed to report on the cause of the cost of living in England made its report public.

I here insert a brief abstract of that report:

Your committee have consequently found themselves obliged to extend their inquiry into the causes of the increase in prices and the possible checks that may be applied.

The chief causes are:

The expansion of credits during the war.

The demand of commodities exceeding the supply and the inadequacy of Government action to control prices.

Increase of wages and consequent increase in the cost of production.

Increase in the rates of profits.

Unfavorable rates of exchange in some of the countries from which supplies are imported.

Some of these are at once effects of the increase of prices and causes of further increases.

It would be difficult, and it is also unnecessary, to determine what is the order of importance of these various factors. But it is certain that among the most important is the expansion of credits.

If it had been possible to finance the war from day to day by means entirely of the process of taxation and of loans of money drawn from the savings of the people, there can be no doubt that the general increase of prices would have been considerably less than it has been; the result would have been to transfer purchasing power from the hands of individuals to the hands of the Government. But the Government, through the Bank of England and the joint-stock banks, has created large new credits to enable its contractors to expand their production. It has also borrowed from the Bank of England large sums on ways-and-means advances, and, in so far as these advances have not been offset by equivalent borrowings from the market on the part of the bank, which has not always been the case, this operation has been a pure creation of credit.

The recommendations for remedial legislation to correct the errors were as follows:

Our recommendations in respect of those aspects of the question of prices which are dealt with in this report are as follows:

1. Whatever measures are possible should be taken by the Government to avoid the creation of new credits in financing the war.

2. An inquiry should be set on foot to ascertain what has been the actual increase in the cost of living to the working classes and how far it has been counterbalanced by advances apart from wage advances due to war conditions.

3. The measures for the limitation of profits should be continued and stronger and should be made more widely known to the people.

4. The strongest case should be required to be established before any advance in wages is conceded on any grounds other than the rise in the cost of living. Nor should it be regarded as a rule—and we have no reason to think that labor in general would wish that it should—that wage earners in receipt of not inadequate pay before the war should be exempted from the share in the economic sacrifices involved by a state of war.

5. A single policy under the general direction of one authority should be adopted in all industries in the determination of wage questions.

These recommendations are in line with the American Economic Association.

Mr. Chairman, while I recognize the serious state of affairs produced by the war and note the reason urged by the committee that we have no other recourse, we can not saddle this on the Federal Reserve System, and war commands this relief as here proposed, I can not help but also observe that the statement the Federal Reserve System can not carry it is an admission of the danger of the proposal.

The statement that war demands it and we must grant it leads all thoughtful Members here to inquire what will be our attitude when before long almost inevitably a measure will come in here demanding a lowering of the gold reserve. When we are told that we must go on a paper basis because of the war, what then will be our answer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, since the members of the Ways and Means Committee are coming, one by one, before this House, which is sitting in Committee of the Whole for consideration of the war-finance bill, are confessing that when they first looked at this proposition, this bill that passed the Senate of the United States, they were astounded and thought it preposterous, they can not blame the membership of the House for going through a hard mental process in trying to arrive at a determination to support the revised bill of the Ways and Means Committee, which is the Senate bill cut in half.

It was stated here a moment ago that the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury" had appeared in the bill as it first came to the House seventeen times. The members of the Ways and Means Committee point with much pride to the fact that they reduced the number of times that expression appeared in the bill to three.

Now, Members like myself, who have served only five years or less, and who are not in position to demand much time for debate, will find themselves in the course of a short time compelled to accept whatever comes out of conference between House and Senate. Nobody can say whether that expression will be found in the final bill three times or any number of times up to seventeen.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. The gentleman realizes that when the matter involved directly affects the Treasury and the amount of money in the Treasury, undoubtedly it should be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I agree to that, of course.

Mr. HELVERING. And the gentleman will find in the bill that there are no things left to the final decision of the Secretary of the Treasury except where it affects the Treasury itself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Nor do I object to that. I am calling attention to the work the committee congratulates itself on having done. Further, I am doing everything I can to follow the debate to the point where I can vote for the bill. But I can not bring myself to think that the Federal corporation bonds are not to bear the absolute approval of the United States. If we must have a central bank, why not have a full-fledged central bank?

I can not relieve myself of a conviction that the new War Finance Corporation, with its $500,000,000 of capital stock, paid for out of the United States Treasury, and its $2,000,000,000 of bonds of the corporation's own issue, is to become a great holding company for the railroads and the public-service corporations—even the water-power corporations. The War Finance Corporation will give its bonds for the bonds of the railroads and these corporations.

In course of time the railroads will find that they are unable to take back their bonds. The physical property of the railroads is the security. Your War Finance Corporation is then the real owner of the railroads. We do not seem to be able to come out in the open. We do not discuss whether, in voting for this bill, we are voting for Government ownership of railroads. The railroads are now scrambled, and I doubt if they can ever be unscrambled. How will the unscrambling take place if this War Finance Corporation holds and can not rid itself of the railroads' bonds? This is, in my opinion, the big problem which the bill presents, aside from the immediate necessities of extending credits. These might be cared for through an extenson of the Federal Reserve System.

I regret that during the debate on this bill, which, I think, the most important measure in Congress since the declaration of war itself, that some of the great committees of the House are obliged to sit in the committee rooms outside of the Chamber while the House is in session. Hearings of the special committee on water power are on, the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee are on, the hearings before the Naval Affairs Committee are on—all attended by distinguished and far-sighted Members of this House—and so the attendance here, both yesterday and to-day, is limited—limited during discussion of a measure which will cause more discussion and controversy than any law enacted in connection with the war. This is a radical and revolutionary bill. In spite of the statement of the great Ways and Means Committee that they have harmonized it and cut it down and have done the best they could, it is still radical and revolutionary. I am inclined at this time to follow the position taken by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] and by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]. I regret that the bill was not referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that a vote will not be reached on this bill to-day, so that gentlemen who have spoken may be able to place their speeches in the RECORD. The debate has run two days. The statement has been made that it is hoped to reach a vote to-night. In endeavoring to read in the RECORD the speeches made on the floor, I find that in quite a number of instances remarks have been withheld. I think the membership of the House should have the benefit of all the remarks in addition to the printed hearings. From time to time recently I have spoken of the bill as a bill to incorporate Mr. McAdoo. But the bill has been revised. Now it is a bill to incorporate Mr. McAdoo and four others, the chief of whom is likely to be Mr. Warburg. Now, we might just as well come out in the open. If it is necessary to do this thing, let us take off the camouflage and do it. Let the tail go with the hide. We are in the war game to the end. I doubt if many will pretend to a belief that the war will be over in less than four or five years, and it is my belief that this War Finance Corporation, once authorized, will not come to an end in 50 years. [Applause.]

I desire to emphasize and call attention to the statement made yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], as follows:

> Let the United States make such loans as are absolutely necessary to win this war direct to the public utilities, railroads, and industry—supervised by the best brains that this country affords, and thus instill into the public mind an air of confidence instead of suspicion. This confidence when thus acquired by the people will respond in a patriotic manner in the payment of an equitable amount of taxes and subscribe for bonds of the United States on long time, bearing a proper rate of interest. Stop the profiteering and the 10 per cent plus contracts. Convince the public that the billions are being used wisely, honestly, and efficiently to win the war and the best people on the face of this earth, the American people, will respond in the granting of all the credit that is necessary to win this war, if it takes the last dollar that America possesses.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to vote for or against the measure. It has room for much amendment. Some proposed amendments should be adopted. Time for the debate should be extended. I do not criticize the Ways and Means Committee. I presume the members reached a harmonious report by the same processes that brought out the last fearful and wonderful war-revenue bill, for which we all voted, most of us under protest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the time limit allows only a general statement as to the principles of this bill. It creates a corporation greater than the former United States Bank, one charged with the same kind of powers but immeasurably greater, and to be exercised with much more liberty in time of war. In war our trouble is generally inflation by the issue of United States bonds and money and, most of all during the Civil War, by the issue of greenbacks. The Federal reserve notes are in their nature greenbacks. They have a reserve of 40 per cent only. Their increase is something to look at with fear when we see that there are—I think I am right—already sixteen hundred and sixty-five million dollars of Federal reserve notes.

They are issued to bolster credits in the banks. Those credits originally were intended to be commercial paper, which means paper issued on a transaction, a bargain, and a sale. They are now intended openly under this bill to be permanent loans for the industries of this country, whether it be factories, farms, transportation, or shipbuilding or for general purposes, for work only must win this war. I share the views of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], so well stated by him. I believe that income only can finance this war, and I shall ask permission, by way of showing how income can be derived, to insert as an appendix to my remarks section 75 of the internal-revenue act of 1862–63, whereby every industry, as the goods went over the counter of the manufacturers, paid 2 or 3 per cent or a specific tax, so that money came in and was paid every month. Ancillary to internal revenue there were, of course, tariff duties.

Our present scheme of collecting by a yearly accounting up to the 1st of January is becoming very onerous and dangerous. It is upsetting our money market, because it is all paid at one time. Now that the income-tax limit has been reduced to $1,000 for exemption it is offending great masses of the people of the country who are not used to going into a careful accounting every year. We must have something that will give us real power to get revenue.

I want now to point out one or two other matters. Neither credit nor money will produce labor if it does not exist. During the Civil War, when we had not the labor, immigrants flocked from all over the world and filled not only our armies but our railroads, our factories, and our farms. We get none now. We must send to the war or to occupations connected with the war a very large proportion of our able-bodied men, and we must make the rest do much more than they ever did before in order to do the necessary work of the war. In order to do that we may have to "dilute" our labor, as the phrase is abroad, by educating even women to work in the iron mills and run the lathes, the planes, the punch, and the crane. We must get away from all rules, as Europe has done, which prevented apprentices of any kind going into work. We must get rid of the idea that an employer can discharge his men or that the men can leave their work. They must stay at that work, the work of the war. We must come to that; but just at the present time I enter my protest against the immense waste of labor that is taking place. It is said we want to put 30,000 or 80,000 or 100,000 new people as clerks into this city. Perhaps there are too many clerks, but if there were 200,000 a city of 300,000 could double up and the clerks could be billeted in the various houses and quartered there, according to the Constitution, in time of war, according to law, and then there would not be waste of the labor of carpenters and mechanics who ought to be employed now in building ships if we are going to win this war. We are wasting labor.

I fear that this great corporation may be used to encourage something other than mere war work. If this corporation is used to encourage in the United States work in the erection of buildings when we can use what we already have, it will waste labor. If it be used only to encourage and control the enormous quantities of things which must be produced for the war, and will take care of our soldiers, then that is proper labor. We will have to trust the Executive, and probably, therefore, we shall all vote for this bill; but we almost have to look above for aid to see that labor is not wasted.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. FESS. We are inclined to vote for the bill because of necessity that faces us. What will be our attitude when the necessity comes that we must reduce our gold reserve?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not know. These new notes will drive the gold out of the country. We all know that. I want to say one thing more: That I am worried by the provision in our bonds that the interest on the old bonds shall go up to the rate of the new, so that we will have to pay the same rate on the old bonds if we have to borrow at high rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I add the following:

That interest will not have to be raised to that of the corporation bonds authorized by this act. But they will raise the current rate in the money market.

Our real trouble is with the issue of Federal reserve notes. During the Civil War we provided that greenbacks would be redeemable at any time by a five-twenty bond, and the repeal of that provision caused great needless expense. Perhaps we might well provide that Federal reserve notes could be exchanged at will for a Liberty bond. In the Civil War we had to make customs payable in gold. I hope that measure will not be necessary now. All Europe prohibits the export of gold, except by Government license. We may have to follow their example.

But our real financial strength must be in revenue—direct, certain, and continuous. I append a letter from a friend in New Jersey as to the working of our war-revenue act, as well as a copy of the section of the acts of 1862–63, which taxed manufactures other than cigars and tobacco. The details of this taxation have been forgotten by most of us.

NEWARK, N. J., February 6, 1918.

Hon. R. WAYNE PARKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: A matter of taxation has interested me quite a bit. Both of us go back to the War of Rebellion, when manufacturers were taxed on sales and not on profits.

We have in our firm the old original receipts that show when the Government first began taxation, to pay the war debt, of 2 per cent, increasing it 1 per cent at a time until they reached as high as 6 per cent. Then when they began to get money enough, they dropped down in the same ratio. When they got back to 2 per cent they gave up taxation.

This method did not tax brains, but taxed the sales. If any concern was foolish enough to do business without a profit, they had to pay tax just the same. To illustrate:

As you know our firm started business in 1855. We have been in it ever since and have always paid 100 cents on the dollar. Now, suppose three of our foremen in different departments should get together and say, "Let us raise a little money, go into business, and buck the old house. We can afford to sell 10 per cent cheaper than they do." They run along four or five years or more, being a thorn in the sides of ourselves, or the man who has brains and does make money, all these years paying no tax whatever for profit as per the present taxation plan, and then quit business.

The need of money was great, to pay the war debt, which was about $4,000,000,000, and the rate of 6 per cent we gave the Government, was plenty of money, and they were soon out of debt.

Why would not this be a better plan now? The United States Government with their taxation plan now makes it so complicated that not one business man out of a thousand hardly understands it. We have even read in the papers that the Attorney General of the United States does not quite understand what the law means. Then, again, the expense of collecting the tax is enormous. The old way, the tax was due and payable the 10th of the month following shipment with the advantage of a very little expense of collecting the money, twelve times a year, and the Government in so short a time had first chance at the party's business to get their money, and at that time we remember that no one seemed to object to it. The plan was so simple that a boy going through common school could understand it. No cash discounts, no rebates, or freights, or anything was allowed. Why couldn't our beloved country follow this plan, which did have the benefit of the previous trial during our War of Rebellion?

Your mind will readily understand many more advantages of this plan as now the Government with its citizens causes a good bit of trouble and annoyance to the same, thereby antagonizing the business of the country rather than fostering the same.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) HENRY P. JONES.

[July 1, 1862, 37th Cong., 2d sess., ch. 119.]

An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay interest on the public debt.

SEC. 75. And be it further enacted, That from and after the said 1st day of August, 1862, upon the articles, goods, wares, and merchandise hereinafter mentioned, which shall thereafter be produced and sold, or be manufactured or made and sold, or removed for consumption, or for delivery to others than agents of the manufacturer or producer within the United States or Territories thereof, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties, to be paid by the producer or manufacturer thereof, that is to say:

On candles, of whatever material made, 3 per cent ad valorem.

On all mineral coals, except such as are known in the trade as pea coal and dust coal, 3½ cents per ton: Provided, That for all contracts of lease lands made before the 1st day of April, 1862, the lessees shall pay the tax.

On lard oil, mustard-seed oil, linseed oil, and on all animal or vegetable oils not exempted nor provided for elsewhere, whether pure or adulterated, 2 cents per gallon: Provided, That red oil, or oleic acid, produced in the manufacture of candles, and used as a material in the manufacture of soap, paraffin, whale and fish oil, shall be exempted from this duty.

On gas, illuminating, made of coal, wholly or in part, or any other material, when the product shall be not above 500,000 cubic feet per month, 5 cents per 1,000 cubic feet; when the product shall be above 500,000 and not exceeding 5,000,000 cubic feet per month, 10 cents per 1,000 cubic feet; when the product shall be above 5,000,000, 15 cents per 1,000 cubic feet; and the general average of the monthly product for the year preceding the return required by this act shall regulate the rate of duty herein imposed; and where any gas company shall not have been in operation for the year next preceeding the return as aforesaid, then the rate shall be regulated upon the estimated average of the monthly product: Provided, That the product required to be returned by this act shall be understood to be the product charged in the bill actually rendered by any gas company during the month preceding the return, and all gas companies are hereby authorized to add the duty or tax imposed by this act to the price per thousand cubic feet on gas sold: Provided further, That all gas furnished for lighting street lamps, and not measured, and all gas made for and used by any hotel, inn, tavern, and private dwelling house, shall be subject to duty and may be estimated; and if the returns in any case shall be understated or underestimated, it shall be the duty of the assistant assessor of the district to increase the same as he shall deem just and proper: And provided further, That coal-tar produced in the manufacture of illuminating gas, and the products of the redistillation of coal tar thus produced, shall be exempt from duty: And provided further, That gas companies so located as to compete with each other shall pay the rate imposed by this act upon the company having the largest production.

On coal illuminating oil, refined, produced by the distillation of coal, asphaltum, shale, peat, petroleum, or rock oil, and all other bituminous substances, used for like purposes, 10 cents per gallon: Provided, That such oil refined and produced by the distillation of coal exclusively shall be subject to pay a duty of 8 cents per gallon, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That distillers of coal oil shall be subject to all the provisions of this act, hereinbefore set forth and specified, applicable to distillers of spirituous liquors with regard to licenses, bonds, returns, and all other provisions designed for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity distilled and securing the payment of duties, so far as the same may, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and under regulations prescribed by him, be necessary for that purpose.

On ground coffee and all preparations of which coffee forms a part, or which is prepared for sale as a substitute for coffee, 3 mills per pound.

On ground pepper, ground mustard, ground pimento, ground cloves, ground cassia, and ground ginger, and all imitations of the same, 1 cent per pound.

On sugar, refined, whether loaf, lump, granulated, or pulverized, 2 mills per pound.

On sugar, refined or made from molasses, sirup of molasses, melado, or concentrated melado, 2 mills per pound.

On all brown, muscovado, or clarified sugars produced directly from the sugar cane, and not from sorghum or imphee, other than those produced by the refiner, 1 cent per pound.

On sugar candy and all confectionery made wholly or in part of sugar, 1 cent per pound.

On chocolate and cocoa prepared, 1 cent per pound.

On saleratus and bicarbonate of soda, 5 mills per pound.

On starch made of potatoes, 1 mill per pound; made of corn or wheat, 1½ mills per pound; made of rice or any other material, 4 mills per pound.

On tobacco, cavendish, plug, twist, fine cut, and manufactured of all descriptions (not including snuff, cigars, and smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in or made exclusively of stems), valued at more than 30 cents per pound, 15 cents per pound; valued at any sum not exceeding 30 cents per pound, 10 cents per pound.

On smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in, 5 cents per pound.

On smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, 2 cents per pound.

On snuff manufactured of tobacco, ground dry or damp, of all descriptions, 20 cents per pound.

On cigars valued at not over $5 per thousand, $1.50 per thousand.

On cigars valued at over $5 and not over $10 per thousand, $2 per thousand.

On cigars valued at over $10 and not over $20 per thousand, $2.50 per thousand.

On cigars valued at over $20 per thousand, $3.50 per thousand.

[Mar. 3, 1863. 37th Cong., 3d sess. Chapter 74.]

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and for other purposes.

That section 75 be, and hereby is, amended by inserting, after the words "Provided, That white lead, oxide of zinc, and sulphate of barytes," the words "and paints and painters' colors"; by inserting, before the words "on lard oil," and attached to the next preceding sentence, as follows: "and all duties or taxes on coal mined and delivered by coal operators at the mines on contracts made prior to July 1, 1862, shall be paid by the purchaser thereof"; by striking out the following words: "on sugar, refined, whether loaf, lump, granulated, or pulverized, 2 mills per pound; on sugar, refined, or made from molasses, sirup of molasses, melado, or concentrated melado, 2 mills per pound," and inserting in lieu thereof as follows: "Sugar refiners shall pay 1 and one-half of 1 per cent on the gross amount of the sales of all the products of their manufactories: Provided, That every person shall be regarded as a sugar refiner under this act whose business it is to advance the quality and value of sugar by melting and recrystallization or by liquoring, claying, or other washing process, or by any other chemical or mechanical means; or who shall advance the quality or value of molasses and concentrated molasses, melado, or concentrated melado, by boiling or other process"; and by inserting therein, in lieu of any other duties or rates of duty on the articles hereinafter enumerated in this section, or provisions existing in relation thereto, the following:

"On marine engines, 3 per cent ad valorem.

"On rivets exceeding one-fourth of 1 inch in diameter, nuts, wrought railroad chairs, bolts, and horseshoes, $2 per ton: Provided, That where a duty upon the iron from which said articles shall have been made has been actually paid, an additional duty only shall be paid of 50 cents per ton.

"On rolled brass, copper, and yellow sheathing metal, in rods or sheets, 1 per cent ad valorem.

"On sails, tents, shades, awnings, and bags made of cotton, flax, or hemp, or part of either, or other materials, 3 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That the sewing of sails, tents, shades, awnings, carpets, and bags, the materials whereof belonged to the employer, shall be exempt from duty where the cloth or material from which they are made was imported or has been subject to and paid a duty.

"On tobacco, cavendish, plug, twist, fine-cut, and manufactured of all descriptions (not including snuff, cigars, and smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in or made exclusively of stems), 15 cents per pound.

"On smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in and on smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, 5 cents per pound.

"On snuff manufactured of tobacco, on (or) stems, or of any substitute for tobacco, ground, dry, or damp, of all descriptions, 20 cents per pound.

"On mineral or medicinal waters or waters from springs impregnated with minerals, 1 cent for each bottle containing not more than 1 quart; when containing more than 1 quart, 2 cents for each bottle.

"Tailors, boot and shoe makers, milliners, and dressmakers making clothing or articles of dress for men's, women's, or children's wear to order as custom work, and not for sale generally, shall to the amount of $1,000 be exempt from duty, and for any excess beyond the amount of $1,000 shall pay a duty of 1 per cent ad valorem.

"On umbrellas and parasols made of cotton, silk, or other material, 3 per cent ad valorem.

"On all ships, barques, brigs, schooners, sloops, sailboats, steamboats (not including the engine), canal boats, and all other vessels or water craft hereafter built, made, or constructed, 2 per cent.

"On sugar candy and all confectionery made wholly or in part of sugar valued at 14 cents per pound or less, 2 cents per pound; when valued at exceeding 14 cents and not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 3 cents per pound; when valued at exceeding 40 cents per pound or when sold otherwise than by the pound, 5 per cent ad valorem.

"On all gold leaf, 15 cents per pack containing not more than 20 books of 25 leaves each.

"On castings of iron exceeding 10 pounds in weight for each casting, not otherwise provided for in this act or in the act to which this act is an amendment, $1.50 per ton: Provided, That there shall be deducted from duties assessed upon railroad cars any duties which may have been assessed and paid upon car wheels under the provisions of this act.

"On clocks and timepieces and on clock movements when sold without being cased, 3 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, while I think the Committee on Ways and Means are to be congratulated because of the changes and modifications made in the bill, yet I can not concur in that high compliment paid by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a few moments ago. While the power of appointment of these four members of the board is removed from the Secretary of the Treasury and given to the President, yet does anyone believe that the father-in-law will appoint a member of this board who is not approved by the son-in-law?

But I rose chiefly to call the attention of the Ways and Means Committee to what I consider to be a discrimination or unfairness in this matter. This bill appropriates $500,000,000 of the people's tax money or the money from sale of liberty bonds to prosecute the war to aid big business. You say to the small taxpayer, to the small business concern, "Come across on the 15th of June next with your money"; and when they petition you for a few days' relief through paying in installments, the Ways and Means Committee so far has given no heed and the ear of the Secretary of the Treasury can not be reached; but in the hearings, and it has been intimated on the floor in the speeches, it is said that by appropriating the five hundred millions of the tax money of the people you can aid certain big business concerns of the country to pay their taxes. That is to be found in the hearings or somewhere along the line. That is, the big business concern that can get the ear of the Secretary will receive help, but the small business concern out in my district in southeastern Ohio, in the coal and iron industry, or whatever manufacturing enterprise it may be, can not get his ear. At least they have not been able apparently to get his ear up to the present time or the ear of the Ways and Means Committee, to get an extension of time for the payment of these excess war taxes, which is to go to make up this $500,000,000 to help big business. Suppose there are some street railways up in the State of Michigan, and suppose some Wall Street gentlemen have started a great corporation up there and have loaded up with more street railways than they can carry and now they want to come to the United States Government and have it get back of it and give them credit. I do not know but if we had a list of these concerns I could vote more intelligently.

Many industries and business concerns of my district desire an extension of time for the payment of the excess-profits tax. I have a score of letters from representative concerns stating that the requirement to pay the whole tax in June will work a great hardship and likely interfere seriously with the coming sale of liberty bonds. These industries have had to carry heavy stocks and shipping conditions have been so abnormal as to prevent them from realizing on their manufactured product and required an additional borrowing. It seems to me that if Congress passes legislation to assist big business through this great crisis it should not fail to pass an act granting the temporary relief so generally petitioned for by the medium-sized and small industries of the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have not been a Member of this House very long, but I will say to you that in private conference with men whom I consider the level-headed Members of the House I have never heard as universal private condemnation of anything that has been proposed as there has been of this bill. Men say both publicly and privately that in time of peace this thing would be nothing short of rotten and criminal, and the thing I can not figure out is, why adopt a program that would be in time of peace rotten and depend upon it in an hour of the greatest financial strain?

It seems to me we are saying: "There is an old boat I would not trust my family in on a picnic, but if we are going into war I will put them into it." Here is a financial program that is privately denounced by the men on the committee and by men on other committees of this House, and yet they are saying under their breath: "We do not know of anything else that can be done." Now, I am going to move when we come to consider the bill—I will not have time to discuss all the features of the bill that seem to be objectionable and are—I am going to move to strike out section 9. I want to say now that since war was declared I have gone beyond what seemed to be good judgment in supporting some of the administration measures. I hope to be able to vote for this bill; but with section 9 in it I do not see how any man can vote for it, and I desire the committee, when the time shall come, to devote its time to clearing up as to why it permitted section 9 to remain in the bill. Look at that section for a moment, especially lines 22 down to 25. The secretary of this corporation shall be permitted to loan directly 16⅔ per cent of all of the capital stock and the bonds sold to corporations only for the purpose of conducting said business in the United States—that is, war business—and only when such firm, corporation, or association is unable to obtain funds through banking associations or from the general public. Now, what does that mean in plain terms? It means that just about $400,000,000 of this money, if we were up to the total of our stock and our bonds, which can be done on the advice of the Secretary and two members of this board, and we would get out the two and a half billion dollars, $400,000,000 of the money is available at the choice of three men on this board to give out to bankrupt concerns that will have machinery—and that is all they do have—whose business is so rotten that they can not get accommodation either from the banks or from private loans.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. What about the savings banks who may be in very great trouble?

Mr. MEEKER. If the gentleman would take out the manufacturing concerns, that is another proposition; but here, gentlemen, now, when you think for a moment of the possibility on the other side, let us take some great corporation, whether transportation or otherwise. A gentleman's agreement is always possible. Suppose that great corporation is hard pressed for money or for whom and over whom a certain other concern wishes to get control, all the banks need to do is to say to that concern, "We can not let you have the money. We have no money to loan to you." And the great private loaning institutions can say, "At this time we have no money to turn over to you." Then these men are upon the Government because of this relief that is being offered. Now, then, whenever you put the United States Government into the category of a three-gold-ball concern, as section 9 puts it, when you demand 133⅓ per cent of security for the loan for a man, a public utility, or a railroad who can not get money elsewhere, it is nothing more than the game of a man who holds out the three balls in front of his store, and we convert our corporation and our Secretary of the Treasury into a Shylock, as he holds this threat over these men, and then their business is to be turned over to whoever can take that loan off their hands because the railroads and all public utilities have not the securities to put up the extra margin.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that is a fair statement of the case?

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman state it fairly? I will say to you, of all the vicious things in it that is the worst.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought the purpose of this provision was to enable a concern, which needed money and could not get it, but which had collateral that it could not sell, to get the money from the corporation that we are about to organize by putting up the collateral. That is the purpose.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; but think of the unthinkable situation to the gentleman himself, to say that here is a concern that has collateral, a going concern, which can not get money either from banks or from the general public—the very thing points at fraud and the possibilities of fraud, and you can not get away from it when you say here is a man who has got collateral and everything, but he can not get a little money from the bank or from some private institution, nobody will furnish him money, and then turn to the Government, and it says, "Put up 133 per cent, and we will take over your institution, and what will be done with it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate expires at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think the agreement was that there would be an hour and 10 minutes of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it expires at 12.10.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the attention, then, of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and say, if the gentleman will agree to permit us to run by unanimous consent to the conclusion of this speech, and five minutes more for the other side, that will conclude all debate.

Mr. KITCHIN. We want to start reading the bill at 10 minutes after 12. I will yield my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time expires at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. There are four minutes due now for general debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to keep the agreement with the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS]. I yield so much of the time as is remaining to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be generally conceded by all those to whom I have had the pleasure of listening in the course of this debate, and I have, I think, heard practically all of those who have spoken on the bill on both sides so far, that this would not be considered wise legislation in ordinary peace times and under ordinary circumstances. I take it that perhaps no man in this House would think for a moment of voting for this bill under such circumstances. I think that no committee of this House would think for a moment of seriously proposing this legislation under ordinary circumstances in times of peace. But, gentlemen, these are not ordinary circumstances, and these are not times of peace. This legislation is frankly presented here to the House as emergency legislation, and for that reason only are we asked to vote for it. It is a condition and not a theory, to quote the language of a former Chief Executive of this Nation, that confronts us at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for four minutes.

Mr. GARNER. You can not do that. Let them read a section and then let the gentleman continue.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill,

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I.—WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

That the Secretary of the Treasury and four additional persons (who shall be the directors first appointed as hereinafter provided) are hereby created a body corporate and politic in deed and in law by the name, style, and title of the "War Finance Corporation" (herein called the corporation), and shall have succession for a period of 10 years: Provided, That in no event shall the corporation exercise any of the powers conferred by this act, except such as are incidental to the liquidation of its assets and the winding up of its affairs, after six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to ask the attention of the committee for a few moments to the condition of the savings banks of the country as they are related to this war-emergency legislation. Now, I sympathize with much that has been said here by those who are opposed to this legislation. I sympathize with much that has been said by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], but I note that the gentleman from California in the course of his remarks took occasion to state that he saw no particular reason why this legislation was necessary in the interests of the savings banks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman on that proposition. I believe that the legislation is necessary, and vitally necessary, to the savings bank institutions of this country at this time.

Why is it necessary? It is necessary because the great credit facilities of the country have been preempted, as the Secretary of the Treasury said in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, by the Government; and, in view of the enormous borrowings of the Government in the great liberty loans which we have had and those which are forthcoming, it is inevitable that there will be great withdrawals from the savings banks of the country. In fact, those withdrawals have already begun.

Now, let me for just a moment call attention to the magnitude of these interests. The mutual savings banks in my section of the country are of greater importance and of greater magnitude, even, than the national banking interests. You take New England and the Middle States, and the total deposits in the mutual savings banks of those States amount to more than four and a half billions of dollars, while deposits of all kinds in national banks in those same States amount to a little more than four billions of dollars. So that the deposits in the mutual savings banks of New England and the Middle States to-day exceed the deposits in the national banks in those same States by practically $500,000,000. Now, these mutual savings banks, gentlemen, are restricted in the investments which they can make. They do not make what they call liquid investments. Their investments are in long-term bonds and securities, running over a considerable length of time. They are restricted by the laws of these several States in the matter of the investments that they can make, and they are held down by a strict supervisory power in the hands of the bank commissions in the several States.

In my own State of New Hampshire, a small State as compared with the larger States of the Union, the total mutual savings bank deposits amount to $126,000,000. Now, that is more than three times the assessed valuation of all the railroad property in our State. It is practically three times the assessed value of the manufacturing plants in the State of New Hampshire. It is about one-half of the assessed valuation of all improved and unimproved land and buildings in the State of New Hampshire. There are $50,000,000 of deposits that are loaned out to residents of our own State, and there are $76,000,000 of those deposits that are loaned beyond the limits of the State of New Hampshire.

Hon. James O. Lyford, of Concord, N. H., chairman of our State board of bank commissioners, and one of the most accomplished and able officials in the country, in testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, said:

> Of the $126,000,000 of accumulations of the savings banks of New Hampshire nearly $50,000,000 are loaned or invested in the State; nearly $26,000,000 are loaned on real estate mortgages at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. Thirteen millions are loaned to the business interests of the State, loans that could not be collected without disastrous results to business and employment. One million dollars is loaned to New Hampshire municipalities at a low rate of interest, besides the amount invested in the bonds of these municipalities. These bonds bear interest rates of from 3 to 4 per cent. Another $10,000,000 is invested in securities of New Hampshire industrial and transportation companies, and in the bonds of cities, towns, and districts of the State. These investments within the State would be larger if our demands were larger.
> Seventy-six millions of our accumulations, or three-fifths, are invested in other States and contribute to the growth and prosperity of those States. In round numbers $17,000,000 are loaned to farmers of the West and South at an average rate to the savings banks of not over 5½ per cent. Eleven millions are invested in municipal bonds, of which amount probably $8,000,000 are in municipal bonds of the West and South. Thirty-three millions are invested in railroad securities, of which amount probably one-half are in the securities of railroads west of the Mississippi and south of the Potomac. Eleven millions are invested in the securities of public utilities, of which amount probably one-third is invested in the securities of public utilities of the West and South. Nearly $3,000,000 are invested in the stock of manufacturing companies of New England and other States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Hampshire may proceed for five minutes further. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I thank the committee for this extension of time.

As I was saying, $76,000,000 of our deposits are loaned beyond the limits of our own State, to residents and people in the western country. Now, while in general I shall support this bill and believe in it as being absolutely necessary in this war emergency, and for that reason only, I am very much opposed to one provision in the bill relating to the savings banks, and I am going to call attention to that in the few minutes remaining of my time.

If you will refer to section 8, I think it is, of the bill, relating to the loans to savings banks, you will note that the savings banks, when they go to this war-finance corporation for aid to meet the withdrawals which are bound to come and which have already begun, let me say, in my State. In the last six months of the year we lost a little more than $2,500,000 of our deposits and also, in addition to that, lost the normal increase amounting to about $3,500,000, which has been the normal increase for a number of years, making a total loss of about $6,000,000 in our savings banks deposits in the last six months of the last year. I say when these savings banks go to this war-finance corporation for aid to meet these withdrawals that are bound to come, and especially bound to come if another liberty loan goes up to 4½ per cent, which is a greater per cent, let me say, than any of our savings banks pay, under those circumstances what does the savings bank have to do?

They have not only got to put up this gilt-edged collateral which they now hold—the best collateral in the world—to the extent of 133 per cent of the market value at the time of the loan, but they are also subject to a discriminating interest rate of 1 per cent—not less than 1 per cent, the bill states, over and above the rate of the Federal reserve bank in the district in which the borrowing institution is located.

Now, gentlemen, I maintain that that is wrong, so far as it relates to the mutual savings banks, and I will tell you why it is wrong. It is wrong for this reason: The mutual savings bank is the people's institution. It is the institution that contains the savings of the common man—the common, everyday worker. These savings-bank deposits in my own State average less than $500 to a man, and that is true throughout New England and the Middle States. There are over eight and one-half millions of these depositors in that section of the country, and these depositors are very largely made up of the common, everyday working people. These savings-bank deposits are made up of their little savings. They are trying to save their money to build a home, many of them. They are ordinarily wage earners.

Now, I say it is wrong to charge this discriminating interest rate of 1 per cent for that reason, and also for the reason that these banks are not money-making institutions, as an ordinary State bank is. In the case of the mutual savings banks, whatever money they make goes to the credit of the depositors. Every dollar of it goes to the credit of these small depositors. It is not, I repeat, an ordinary money-making institution like your State bank. It has no stock. It has no expense of any account except what it pays to its treasurer and the few assistants that he has, and the tax that it pays to the State. The institution is run with little expense, and all for the benefit of the depositors. Now, why should the Government of the United States, which is responsible for this condition, charge a discriminating rate of 1 per cent interest over and above the reserve rate? I say that it is wrong, and I shall move to amend the bill in that particular when the time comes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has again expired.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House in opposition to the pro forma amendment for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah is recognized.

Mr. WELLING. I ask that by unanimous consent I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, the war-finance bill for industrial credits was presented to the House last Saturday, March 16, by the Committee on Ways and Means. It was debated all day Saturday and Monday by distinguished members of that committee. I listened to every word of that debate.

MR. KITCHIN SUPPORTS THE PRESIDENT.

The presentation of the bill by the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] was at once candid and illuminating. There was no evasion and not the least disposition to deceive the House as to the sweeping powers conveyed to the executive branch of the Government under the proposed measure. His presentation not only showed a brilliant intellect loyally supporting the President and his advisers but fearlessness in criticizing the provisions of the original administration draft of what is now the pending war-finance bill for industrial credits. I think every member of the committee who discussed the bill in general debate, and many of those who will discuss it under the five-minute rule, have paid or will pay generous tribute to Mr. KITCHIN's patriotic service in perfecting the bill in committee and to his ability in advocating its passage upon the floor of the House. We have been advised repeatedly by those who have followed him that not much remained to be said in general explanation of the measure.

MR. FORDNEY SUPPORTS THE PRESIDENT.

The chairman of the committee was followed by the ranking Republican member of the committee, Mr. FORDNEY, of Michigan. He, like the chairman, contributed helpful and valuable information upon which the membership of the House were expected to base their judgment of the wisdom of this legislation. To those of us who had formed our impressions of the warfare of party government from reading the proceedings of former fiscal legislation in this body it was and has been for a year past an inspiring lesson in self-forgetting, patriotic service to see these old veterans of former wars come in here together and advocate with equal zeal a measure which in normal peace times would provoke the most bitter and violent controversy.

Of course no responsible party would bring into this House a measure so sweeping in its grant of executive power in time of peace, and if they did, even those of us whose chief function has been for a year past to sit at your feet and absorb some of your political wisdom would have rejected such leadership and done what was possible, however little that might be, to defeat such a measure.

Both of the great leaders of the Ways and Means Committee here referred to spoke without notes. Out of the abundance of a lifetime of thoughtful service devoted to their country's welfare, both with the same measure of patriotism and intelligence gave equal service to the country and to the House.

MR. HULL SUPPORTS THE PRESIDENT.

Two additional speeches were made upon this bill in general debate on Saturday—one by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]; one by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. These latter speeches were entirely and absolutely dissimilar, except in one particular—both were carefully prepared set speeches. Both were evidently the matured and settled convictions of these gentlemen. It is proper to assume that both represented what each of these gentlemen conceived to be his most helpful contribution to the debate on the bill before the House. I said that these speeches of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Tennessee were alike in their careful preparation and formal presentation. They do not admit of any further analysis together, except to say that both represent the author's individual estimate of what constitutes support of the President of the United States.

They went in opposite directions and were intended to accomplish entirely different purposes. The contribution from the gentleman from Tennessee was perhaps the most illuminating technical presentation the bill will receive in its entire progress from the committee-room draft to the finished product of Congress which will receive presidential approval. He had but one purpose in making his speech, and that was to bring within the reach of all the ripened wisdom of his own thought. He gave intelligent direction to the thought of his associates here, and contributed much to the enlightened public opinion of his countrymen elsewhere.

MR. LONGWORTH'S ATTITUDE.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] likewise, I assume, brought to this discussion his most helpful contribution to assist us to understand the measure. The result of his effort was a cleverly contrived and pleasantly expressed political utterance. It could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be said to serve a useful purpose in adding to our fund of information on the merits of the bill itself. I hope that some of our faces, at least, have grown familiar to the gentleman from Ohio. I want to give him my respectful assurance that I am personally grateful for his genial good humor. I shall appreciate any scrap of helpful information he may contribute to my legislative experience while I am here. But what he said on Saturday was not intended to assist even the humblest of us to arrive at a just conclusion upon this great and sweeping measure.

He merely used the House of Representatives to punctuate his clever partisan harangue with desultory and single-handed applause, culminating at the end with what some fiction writer has set down as "prolonged applause." I like to read that sort of a speech, and, of course, the gentleman from Ohio knows that his constituents, for whom it was built, will also like to read it. I undertake to say, however, that those of you who put in the applause added more to the readability and effectiveness of the thing than the author himself contributed between those perfunctory performances.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WINGO). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLING. I can not yield very well, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I really want to ask only one question, and that is whether the speech that the gentleman is reading is a prepared speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLING. Yes; I submit cheerfully that it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is on the war corporation bill?

Mr. WELLING. Yes, sir. [Laughter.]

It will look well, however, as a campaign document, and having succeeded in that, I cheerfully congratulate the gentleman from Ohio upon his self-appointed contribution to this debate.

It is a rather sad commentary, however, upon the generosity of the House to applaud the support (?) which the gentleman from Ohio in his speech gave to the President, and accept with stolid indifference the reasoned analysis of the bill and the splendid support to the President given by the gentleman from Tennessee. The speech of the gentleman from Ohio shows that we like to be amused. It proves that Mr. Barnum was right when he said, "The American people love to be humbugged." [Laughter.]

The debate of last Saturday was illuminating, and characteristic of the best and the worst of that which is heard in this Hall. Three-fourths of it was wholly self-forgetting and dedicated to the public welfare. One-fourth of it was purely partisan and dedicated to Cincinnati, Ohio. [Applause.]

Three-fourths of it was a conscientious effort to support the President of this Republic and help him bear the heavy burden of this unprecedented hour. One-fourth of it was conceived with the thought—to use the gentleman's own words—that it would help to put some one else where Woodrow Wilson now stands, "whether within or without the family circle."

Three-fourths of these men did not find it at all necessary to proclaim their support of the President in his great war policies. They suspected, and rightly, too, that every right-thinking man in America would take their support for granted, as a mere matter of routine. One-fourth of these men found it necessary to assert loudly, in every paragraph, that he was most valiant in supporting the President. After each protestation of affection and support, he characterized the President as an isolated autocrat, asking for, if not exercising, despotic power.

It is entirely in keeping with the eccentricities of human nature that he who most loudly proclaims his support conceals beneath a smiling self-complacency a stiletto thrust intended to wound and to destroy. [Applause.] I challenge any man to read the RECORD of last Saturday and come away from it with the honest impression that the gentleman from Ohio was supporting the President or his war policy in his contribution to that debate.

THE PRESIDENT'S DUTY TO CONGRESS.

The gentleman is an able critic of what he denounces as executive usurpation of legislative functions. He does not want any Cabinet officer to come to his committee with a prepared bill, but the gentleman comes empty handed to the deliberation of this committee without a bill of his own to meet the crisis. [Applause.] Of course, the bill presented by the administration was imperfect. It was, I dare say, merely intended to guide the judgment of Congress in meeting an issue first seen by these "watchmen upon the tower." [Applause.]

The President presents the skeleton of a great piece of emergency legislation to the House and asks this Congress to build the completed body and breathe into it the breath of life. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Utah yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. WELLING. I can not yield to my good friend until I get through.

ALL SERVE IN HONOR.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, I think no American would feel satisfied if the President had done less than he has done. For the thing which he has done every patriot has reason to be grateful for his constructive genius and far-seeing statesmanship. [Applause.] They appreciate the courage which meets these great problems fearlessly as they arise, alike indifferent to the opposition of the demagogue and the disappointed wail of partisan politicians who secretly wish that they had invented the idea themselves. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Ohio indulged in the cheapest sort of partisanship in exalting Republican volunteers who have resigned from this House to enter the Army and denouncing Democratic Members as mercenary who have resigned to serve their country in civil life. We all share with the gentleman his admiration and affection for the lamented Augustus P. Gardner. [Applause.] His tribute to Maj. Gardner would have been more effective if unenforced with a veiled criticism of John J. Fitzgerald, than whom this House has never known a more useful or devoted servant. [Applause.] The appearance upon this floor of Capt. HEINTZ in uniform would cause this House to rise in pride to his service in the Army; but the House would not greet him with more affection or with greater pride than it would greet that grizzled old statesman, Judge Adamson, of Georgia, if he were to appear here in the despised habiliments of civil life. [Applause.] It was mere bunk of the cheapest sort to say these soldiers are serving without pay. The gentleman must know and does know that this salary question is wholly a matter of law and that no man in this Congress would wish to deprive these men of a single cent of it.

PARTISANSHIP INDEFENSIBLE.

Gentlemen of the committee, partisan politics and partisan action can not be defended during this world conflict. The life of the Nation is at stake, and it is as much my Nation as yours. I have said with pride, many times, that Republicans were as loyal as Democrats to the Nation, to the flag, and to the President. No man ought to stand here unrebuked and seem to arraign Democrats, as a class, against Republicans, as a class. The gentleman labored painfully to show that Democrats gave less loyal support to the President in the vote on the selective-draft law than did the members of his own party. I voted with the gentleman from Ohio for the draft law, but better men than he or I, on both sides of this isle, believed the volunteer plan of raising an army the better plan. I should feel a certain contempt for myself if I intimated, here or elsewhere, that they are less loyal to the President than I am solely because of that vote. [Applause.]

It has been repeatedly said that executive officers of the Government were partisan in their appointments to positions in the civil branch of the Government. I deny the truth of the charge. I welcome whatever strength the President can obtain by surrounding himself with trusted men who can harmonize their viewpoint with his lofty conceptions of this Nation's mission and its ideals. I care not what the political convictions of these men may be. The men who are demanding a reconstruction of the Cabinet ought to come to us with proof of their wisdom by showing just how the proposed changes would benefit the situation. [Applause.] If gentlemen really know just how to manage the problem of this colossal conflict let some one rise in his place, before a policy has been decided upon or proposed elsewhere, and give proof of his wisdom by offering a saner and a better plan. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. WELLING. It will take me only three minutes to finish, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent for time in which to close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes additional. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What additional time, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if any more time is to be asked under the five-minute rule for political speeches on the other side? If so, I want to object now.

Mr. WELLING. I want to say in reply to that that I disclaim any intention of speaking for the Democratic side. I did not mention this talk to any human being before I stood up on my legs here to deliver it. I am not in collusion with leaders on either side. What I say here is my own, and I am personally responsible for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I think the gentleman is doing no harm. Let him go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for three minutes more.

THE CALAMITY HOWLER DISAPPOINTED.

Mr. WELLING. It was stated boldly in the beginning that the Navy Department should be reorganized. No man to-day has the temerity to stand up in his place and demand a change in that great, alert, and increasingly powerful Army of our fighting strength. [Applause.]

A few months ago it was the fashion in some quarters to assert that our war policy and our War Department were in inefficient hands. It is the growing and deliberate judgment of the country to-day that no mistake was made either in policy or personnel. [Applause.]

A few months ago men said that the selective-draft law could not be superimposed upon our military structure. It has been accepted to-day by every loyal and thoughtful American. There is not one word of criticism. It has succeeded better than its best friends predicted it would succeed.

Not long ago men criticized the manner of floating our first and second liberty loans. Every candid man to-day will acknowledge they were brilliantly conducted and wisely managed.

Some months ago, without a word of criticism, we enacted the great soldiers and sailors' insurance law. It is universally conceded to be the just and generous action of a great, free people to care for our soldiers in the field and to provide for their relatives and loved ones at home. Unable to find a flaw in the law itself, the critics say it has been put in operation by Democratic officials, employing Democratic clerks, under the direction of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance. That would be unimportant even if it were true, but it is not true. The thing I am proud of to-day is that no gentleman has ever said upon this floor that the work of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance was not effectively, efficiently, and courteously administered. [Applause.]

I am glad to say that the criticism here pointed out has not been chiefly political. I assert here again that it is bipartisan. It is equally true that every great constructive measure since the beginning of the war has received loyal and helpful support from both great political parties.

It has pleased God, in His infinite wisdom, to place at the head of this Nation a great Democratic President during this war. No criticism yet aimed at him has been potent enough to shake the faith of the American people in the lofty patriotism and masterful statesmanship of Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

He has of necessity exposed himself to every form of criticism and abuse. But he stands to-day where he has stood for years past, the best loved and most honored Executive this Nation has ever had since martyred Lincoln died. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 2, line 3, before the word "years," strike out the word "ten" and insert "eight."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment should be adopted, it would mean that the life of the War Finance Corporation as such would be reduced from 10 to 8 years. The moral effect of cutting down the life of this corporation at this time would be good.

The public is in no frame of mind to continue indefinitely the life of a corporation such as this. So much doubt has been expressed as to the wisdom of establishing this corporation at all that it seems advisable we should say to the people that this is not a permanent organization, is not intended to be permanent, but is a temporary organization called into life and being solely because of the exigencies of the war.

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman to the remainder of that section, the latter portion of it, in which its active work is limited to six months after the war is over.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is correct. Six months after the termination of the war, and the bill provides that also in the case of the Capital Issues Committee; but no one can tell how long the war will last. I am speaking of the effect of informing the public at this time of the propriety of limiting the life of the corporation. The affairs of the corporation can not be closed up within six months after the close of the war, no matter when that is, if the business of the corporation continues during the period of the war.

Mr. GARNER. But its active life ceases six months after the President's proclamation of peace.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does; but I question whether the members of the corporation will not continue to receive their $12,000 per annum. The business will have to be continued. Somebody will be obliged to go on for the purposes of liquidation.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that the salaries would go on after the affairs of the corporation were wound up?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; unless we have some new legislation, because somebody must carry on this business.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It seems to me that the business of the corporation must stop when its affairs are wound up, and the corporation ends at that time. It may end sooner than 10 years, it may end sooner than 8 years, and certainly the salaries of these officers would cease at that time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I addressed myself to this matter for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the obligations of this corporation are to be made for a period of five years. If the war continues three years and obligations are made up to the expiration of three years for a five-year period, that means that the business of the corporation necessarily will cover a period of three years plus five years, or eight years.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. And six months in addition to that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and six months in addition to that. If the war lasts for 10 years, plus the six months for closing up the affairs of the corporation, and obligations are made for five years, it will mean that 15 years plus 6 months will be the life of this corporation. I am in favor of giving notice to the corporation itself and to the banking interests and to the Treasury Department that we do not desire a permanent corporation here, but wish it to limit its business, to get through as speedily as possible, and then quit. There can be no harm in reducing the period of the life of the corporation. If necessary the corporation can come to Congress and ask for an extension of its life. It should be made to understand that it is not supreme, but that it must come to Congress to ask for a continuance of its life or for any extension of its powers. That is the whole point of the argument. I want Congress to retain its hold upon this corporation. If at the end of eight years it is necessary for the corporation to prolong its life it can come here and ask Congress for such an extension as may be necessary.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 22, noes 41.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have hesitated a good deal whether I should say anything at all upon this bill, because my feelings about it are very mixed. Up to this time I have voted willingly and cheerfully to give the administration all the powers it has asked, I think, but in this instance I confess I have serious misgivings. I think I shall vote for the bill, though I am still going to listen to the debate; but I should like to say a word as to the way I look upon it. A great many men on both sides of the House have said that when they first read this bill it shocked them, and I admit I sympathize with that experience. It is an old adage of philosophy that the possession of power begets the greed for power. I am inclined to think this administration is illustrating that old adage, and I know of no instance that to my mind illustrates it more forcibly and clearly than this bill, as it was originally presented to this House. The Secretary of the Treasury has never, to my knowledge, been charged with shrinking modesty, but if he has it he certainly did not betray it in the drafting and presenting of this bill, because I can not conceive of more assurance than was required to ask the power proposed in this bill as it originally was presented. It gave to the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the approval of the President—and that was to the reigning family—absolute power to appoint the five directors, to discharge at will the five directors, and to fix the salaries of the five directors. So that as this bill was originally presented to this House it gave power to the Secretary of the Treasury to control absolutely through a board of dependent directors the business life of this country and to force upon corporations either bankruptcy or prosperity at his pleasure. And I am sure that is a power which very few would think any administration could safely be trusted with. The gentleman from Texas this morning said that nine-tenths of the Members of this House when they first read the bill were opposed to it, and nine-tenths of the Members now are in favor of it. Very likely that is true, but I think that the distinction is not that the nine-tenths of the Members have changed their minds, but the bill has been changed, and while we could not approve it as it first came to the House, improved as it has been by the Ways and Means Committee, we probably can now give it our assent.

But to me the fundamental danger about the bill is that it establishes this great corporation, which is really a banking corporation, which can exercise absolute favoritism over the business community. We have all boasted that the Federal Reserve System—I certainly have boasted—was prepared to meet emergencies, and that it has splendidly met emergencies. I hoped that it could meet every emergency. This is a great banking proposition, and I am not at all sure that this can not be met best not by such a corporation as this but by ordinary banking facilities, improved and assisted by legislation.

It might be necessary to proclaim a moratorium. I suppose that the most crying necessity for such a corporation is that there are falling due enormous quantities of bonds and other obligations which can not be met or renewed because the United States is floating bonds and absorbing the savings which would naturally flow into these bonds, and therefore the bonds can not be floated. That probably is true. But it seems to me that a remedy even safer than this might be to apply a moratorium with a fair readjustment of interest so that these great issues of bonds which are coming due might be compelled to be continued and held and renewed, not by loans of the United States, for that is practically what this bill provides, but by the present holders. There would occasionally, of course, be individual instances of suffering under that, but after all it would not generally be unfair to compel people to continue their investments with more favorable interest, and if that were done, it seems to me, our present banking system could rise to the emergency and in that way we would not be obliged to go into this new field of finance and establish this new corporation, which after all is founded on the same old principle that the Greenbackers always indorsed, that the Government should furnish money for the people, and is subject to the charge if not to the accomplishment of favoritism and discrimination and graft. The most of us agree that that is a very unfortunate idea to place in the minds of people. Here we are doing it for the big business of the country, because it is said that that is the only way it can be met. It may be true. I recognize that the committee have studied the bill and its necessity far more deeply than I and I am disposed to defer to their opinion; but I have great misgivings, a fundamental antagonism to allowing such an opportunity for favoritism and control over the business of the country to any man or corporation. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, the Federal reserve banking system was not intended to meet war emergencies of this description. No strictly commercial banking system could possibly meet emergencies such as the refunding of the indebtedness of great private corporations. If we were to do as England did, and as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has suggested we might do; that is, declare a moratorium in matters of that kind, we might appreciably get over our difficulties and the Federal reserve banking system might, in circumstances of that sort, meet every requirement. But it was not intended to meet emergencies in the investment securities system of the country, and was not devised of it, and ought not to be preverted to that use.

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that we should obscure the meaning or prejudice the intent of this proposed legislation by constantly adverting to one particular phase of it, as has been done in all the discussion so far had. Gentlemen talk about the extraordinary power that this bill confers on the Secretary of the Treasury. One gentleman this morning congratulated the Ways and Means Committee on the fact that it had not manifested abject servility to suggestions from the executive branch of the Government. Well, I admit that we are improving in that respect; but, singularly enough, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] interposed the statement that the original draft of this bill contained 17 instances in which the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury was required, I took my copy of the national banking act, then in my hand, and in about two minutes of cursory reference to the Vreeland-Aldrich Act I found 16 provisions requiring the approval and the exercise of the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. That act was about one-third as long as this proposed bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is an entirely different thing. The trouble with this bill is that it gives an opportunity for discrimination in favor of certain interests.

Mr. GLASS. In answer to that I may say that if the gentleman will take the pains to examine the Vreeland-Aldrich currency act, he will find that the act afforded unprecedented authority to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to exercise discrimination, to exhibit whim and prejudice in the matter of granting credit and the issuance of currency in this country.

That act gave the Secretary of the Treasury absolute dominion over the credits and currency of this country in time of emergency. Care was not even had to surround him with a "dummy directorate," as has been suggested here that this bill does; but he was the whole thing. He was "It." He could even determine in his discretion what banks should become members of the credit associations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury was expressly charged with the power to admit banks to these loan associations, and could deny them admission. See what tremendous power was there vested in one single officer of this Government! The Secretary of the Treasury, under that act, was charged with the duty of determining all credits that might be granted in time of emergency both as to their nature or volume. He was charged with the extraordinary discretion of determining whether any section of this country, whether any State of the 48 States of the American Union, was entitled to the credit for which it might apply in time of panic or emergency.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it not a fact, however, that all those loans that were presented to the Secretary of the Treasury at that time were passed upon by local banking committees?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. SNYDER. And did they not have to be accompanied by the usual collateral?

Mr. GLASS. I am talking about the ultimate power of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury was clothed with the ultimate power, no matter what had been the banking judgment of the local committees, to decline to permit a loan to be made.

Mr. SNYDER. That is true. He had the right to decline, but they were first presented by the local committees.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; and the loans applied for under this bill have to go through the process of examination by local committees and receive the indorsement of the local banks. Nobody raised any objection when that was done. I was a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House at the time. I do not recall that anybody suggested that the Secretary of the Treasury would so far forget his duty to his country as to exercise that unusual power in a way that would prejudice the private or public interests of the United States. When it comes to the exercise of power in an emergency you have got to trust somebody in the last analysis. Take the banking business from its foundation up to its capstone. You see all along the line that the power of discretion and quick action is vested in a few men. Your local bank has its small committee, composed usually of not more than three directors, to pass on loans. Power is delegated to a single cashier of a bank in time of emergency calling for quick action to pass definitely on an application for a loan, without reference to the loan committee or the action of the board of directors. See what has been done for 50 years under your national banking system. The autocrat of the banking and currency system of the country is the Comptroller of the Currency. He has the most extraordinary powers of any man who is brought into relationship with the banking and currency system. He can destroy a bank by a word. The Comptroller of the Currency can alone thrust a bank into receivership. And yet now, in time of war, facing a situation such as the world never dreamed of before, gentlemen attempt to obscure the intent and the real necessities of legislation proposed by constantly adverting to the power it confers on the Secretary of the Treasury. I congratulate the Committee on Ways and Means that it did not fall a servile victim to executive suggestion, and that, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] says, it struck out 14 of the 17 phrases in the bill that gave power to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives and the Finance Committee of the United States Senate 12 years ago fell a victim to that sort of "subserviency," if it may be called "subserviency," which I very much doubt. We have got to trust the patriotism and the wisdom and the courage of men whom we have put in power; and if he were a Republican rather than a Democrat, I would stand here and say that well may we trust to the wisdom and the courage and the discretion of the occupant of the office of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.] I would despise myself if I complaisantly could conceive of the appointment by the President, and the confirmation by the United States Senate, of any man as Secretary of the Treasury who in this time of all other times could not implicitly be trusted to use the power of his office in behalf of the public weal and with an intent to win this war for the United States and the allies. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "four," in line 4, page 1, and insert the word "eight."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to increase the membership of the board of directors from five to nine. I am not in favor of vesting these great powers, unheard of in the history of our country since its foundation, unheard of in any of the foreign belligerent powers, to meet the emergencies occasioned by this world war, in a close corporation consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury and four directors, even though those four directors are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate of the United States. If this were money of our own, we would be loath indeed to charge any five members with the powers that this bill seeks to vest in this board of directors. We all know that in numbers there is security and safety; that the consummate judgment of many is better than the judgment of one. I do not believe that four members, as this bill provides, should be vested with this great power, even though the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to determine the general policy. Rather would I lodge the power in a larger board of directors. There is no bank in the country to-day that has the capital or approaches the capital and resources that this bank will have. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency cited the autocratic power of the Comptroller of the Currency. Yes, the present Comptroller of the Currency is vested with great power and has used that great power at times autocratically against the banks that did not yield to his individual opinion; but this bank is not to be subject to the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency. It is to be supreme in itself, and business men whom I expect to be appointed to this board of directors should be in such number that they would be able to give their individual judgment to the questions of policy that will be presented to this bank for its decision. It was hinted that the Secretary of the Treasury, when he first went before the Committee on Ways and Means in advocacy of the original bill, cited the railway system of Detroit—the D. U. R.—as an instance of funds being needed to rehabilitate that rather bankrupt street-railway corporation.

Why is that street railway system in need of support? Because it has no franchise. The municipality of Detroit is unwilling to grant it a franchise, and yet this bank, this national bank is to be called upon out of the people's funds to advance money to bolster up some local institution that has not standing enough to get support from their own local bankers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is the purpose of this bill to bring succor and relief to these corporations that have not financial standing in their local communities to get support, and I believe that is one of the main reasons advanced for it, if you will look into the bill closely, then those powers should be lodged in a larger directorate than provided in the bill. The directors should be so large in number—I have proposed eight, nine with the Secretary of the Treasury acting as chairman ex officio—so that a director could go and give it his personal investigation as to whether there is warrant for the advance of the Government's money to support the loan. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] grew eloquent in citing the autocratic power that was lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act, and he rose in his perioration in grand style, saying that even if it were a Republican Secretary of the Treasury he would not in this emergency do aught to withhold those powers. But I want to call his attention to the fact that when the Republicans were in control of the administration of this Chamber, at the time of the passage of the Vreeland-Aldrich bill, when we had had a stringency of the money market occasioned by the failure of some local banks in New York City, which spread its influence over the whole country, and the leaders on the Republican side believed it was necessary to prevent a recurrence of such a condition again if it would develop before we could take up and enact a permanent measure for the relief of the financial institutions of the country, that Democrats as a unit, in that patriotic hour and to meet such a condition, voted solidly against the Vreeland-Aldrich bill. They lived to eat their own words, because in the Federal reserve act that they themselves brought into the House, because they happened to be in power at that time, they incorporated and adopted the Vreeland-Aldrich currency act in substance in the Federal reserve bank act until the new system could be established.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman that nobody on this side voted against the Vreeland-Aldrich bill or the principle embodied in that bill on account of the power which was conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and the gentleman is totally mistaken if he thinks the Federal reserve act embodied the Aldrich-Vreeland bill in its provisions. It embodied a very much changed Vreeland-Aldrich bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; but the fundamental principle, notwithstanding, was there and they were obliged to have it retained in the Federal reserve act until that system was established; and the gentleman does not controvert the statement that I made that the Democrats unitedly voted against that entire measure or system for the relief and amelioration of the financial condition of the country to meet a crucial emergency that might confront the country because of the stringency of the money market.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. SWITZER. Have not they still adopted the fundamental principles of the Aldrich bill in allowing them to take all the bonds and notes by Federal reserve banks——

Mr. STAFFORD. This goes way beyond the Vreeland-Aldrich bill, and I am seeking in all seriousness to submit to the attention of this committee the need and the value of having this directorate increased. You gentlemen here, if you were advancing your individual funds for the purpose of stock of this $500,000,000 corporation, would not be willing as stockholders in that corporation to lodge this great power in a directorate of four. You would necessarily say that if that money was to be voted as this is going to be voted and advanced throughout the country it should be lodged in a larger directorate. I offer this amendment in all seriousness, realizing the many duties that the present Secretary of the Treasury has and the need of this great power and authority being lodged in a larger board of directors.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask for information. Can the gentleman cite any instance, or is there any recorded instance, of the abuse of power granted to the Secretary of the Treasury under the Aldrich-Vreeland bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the Secretary of the Treasury did not have much occasion to use the privileges contained in the Aldrich-Vreeland currency bill. That was an emergency measure, and that was passed in case the same condition would arise following its enactment as during the year 1907–8, when we had a financial stringency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will not prevail. Your committee discussed and considered well the question whether the number of directors of this corporation should be increased. It was the thought of the committee, I believe it was the unanimous thought of the committee, that in this emergency measure a directorate of five, the Secretary of the Treasury and four others, could render more harmonious, cooperative, and efficient service than a larger directorate. Outside of the ex officio officers of the Government there are only five directors of the Federal Reserve Board; there are only five members of the Federal Trade Commission; there are only six members of the Tariff Board; and, according to the provisions of this bill, this creates a directorate of five.

Your committee is of the opinion that five directors will be sufficient. It gives a majority of these five the right of action, with one or two or three possible exceptions where the approval of the Secretary must be obtained. But we all agree that it is wise that his approval in those instances should be had, because they relate to bonds and obligations of the United States and the money in the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury is given the power and authority and responsibility of offering for sale and selling the bonds of the United States Government. It is important that the Secretary of the Treasury have some say-so as to how many bonds this corporation should buy or sell and when these bonds should be bought or sold. He should have some say-so, which we gave him when we appropriated the amount of $500,000,000 to be paid in, when and as called by the corporation, because he is in a position to know whether the Treasury condition at the time the directors may call for any particular amount would justify taking that amount from the Treasury at the particular time. Suppose they did not have in the Treasury $500,000,000, and the board of directors should call for $500,000,000, the full amount of this authorized capital stock? Why should not the Secretary of the Treasury, who is responsible for paying out of the appropriation that Congress makes, have some say-so as to when and how much of this capital stock should be called for and when it should be paid? Now, the directors must act with respect to the payment of the capital stock, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Gentlemen, I do not think you need to fear that with these four outside directors, with the Secretary of the Treasury as chairman, that there is going to be any autocratic power or that there can be any autocratic power used. And, as I said at the beginning, we believe, and I believe the judgment of the business men of this House will agree with us, that a directorate of five, in enforcing a great emergency act like this, would be more harmonious and more efficient than a larger directorate.

And I hope the gentleman's amendment will not carry.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. I presume that it is his hope, in offering his amendment providing for a larger number of directors for the corporation to be created, that there will be more chance, at least, of having the directorate reasonably and fairly represent the country—all sections, all views, economic, industrial, and political. If I believed his amendment would accomplish that purpose, which I think the gentleman must have in his mind, I should support his amendment. But if we are not to have four men of the proper sort and kind appointed, we could scarcely hope that out of eight we would secure a better selection. It is true, and it is profoundly regrettable that it is true, that up to this time the country has had reason to be disappointed in the matter of many appointments made to places of high trust and great responsibility. I have no special criticism of the gentlemen who have been appointed, but I do believe that I am justified in saying that they have not always represented the highest character and ability that the majority party has within its ranks. Appointments have failed utterly to fairly represent the differing political views of the country, even in the cases where Congress has provided for such appointments. That has been true in the past, and yet we are compelled under these circumstances to paraphrase the statement of the old patriarch Job, in his affliction, of, "Though He slays me, yet will I trust in Him," by saying, "Though the Chief Executive continue to disappoint us in the matter of appointments, still we must trust him."

The appointing power is his under the Constitution. We have no disposition to take it away from him. But we do hope that inasmuch as men of all parties in all parts of the country are supporting those things believed to be necessary for the conduct of the war, for the maintenance of good conditions in the country, supporting propositions with regard to which they have serious doubts and misgivings—we do hope that in the future, at least, these appointments shall be made of the men best qualified, men with the widest and broadest experience, the men most likely to command the respect of all the people and the confidence of all the people. It also is our hope that where Congress in good faith provides, as in this case, that the appointments shall represent not only the majority but the minority, that provision shall be carried out in good faith, so that the appointments will represent the different and divergent political views held by the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of the corporation shall be $500,000,000, all of which shall be subscribed by the United States of America, and such subscription shall be subject to call upon the vote of three-fifths of the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, at such time or times as may be deemed advisable; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making payment upon such subscription when and as called. Receipts for payments by the United States of America for or on account of such stock shall be issued by the corporation to the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be evidence of stock ownership.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I would like to ask the chairman of the committee as to the statement made by the head of another committee in a responsible body in the country, that last September this bill was framed and provided for $50,000,000 capitalization, with the permission to issue $500,000,000 of bonds. That statement was made in the last few days.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say in answer to the question that I never heard of this bill or this scheme until some time between the 20th and the 25th of January. The first information I had in connection with the bill was given me in the presence of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and two or three Senators, including Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts. I do not think there is anything in the statement suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. No doubt the authors of the bill themselves, who thought of this scheme, had been working on it for months before I saw it.

Mr. FESS. I simply wanted to make the observation that the difference between $50,000,000 and $500,000,000 is only a difference of 1,000 per cent, and if the suggestion was made six months ago by a very responsible man in a very responsible position in our financial organization, and he thought that $50,000,000 six months ago was sufficient and now this $500,000,000 is necessary, it might be a suggestion as to what we would be asked to do later on. And it is another item in this general condition of mind that the country is in to jump at conclusions, to make great leaps, and it causes me considerable bewilderment.

I think that the chairman of the committee will agree with me that if that was suggested, as was stated in another body a short time ago, and that then in this short time we have discovered that that has fallen so far short, and this later suggestion comes, that it is a ground for all of us, desirous of doing the right thing, to take pains to be quite certain of our grounds before we take the step, because finance is such an abstract proposition, and there seems to be such a variety of opinion on it, that a little difference between $50,000,000 and $500,000,000 is rather bewildering, particularly when it comes from the head of the financial institutions of the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield to me there?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In that connection I have been informed that the proposition as finally submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury from the Federal Reserve Board called for a capitalization of $250,000,000 and the right to issue in excess of eight times that, so that the amount thereby authorized would be exactly what is authorized in this bill, a total of $2,500,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Was that the suggestion made originally?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am told that that was the suggestion made by the Federal reserve officers to the Secretary of the Treasury. I have only been told that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have never heard of that before, but if it be true that the original design was $50,000,000, they did not at that time contemplate such extensive powers and such extensive loans. Perhaps only $50,000,000 was the first limit of the capital stock. If that was so, no doubt they only intended at that time to simply include loans to the banks that were loaning direct to war industries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can see how the $50,000,000 of capital stock proposed could have been contemplated when they were simply going to confine the advances to certain institutions. But now this bill contemplates advances to all banking institutions that are making loans to industries necessary or contributory to the war, for instance, railroads or public utilities that are contributing or are necessary to the prosecution of the war. This bill also contemplates the making of advances to savings banks and trust companies that receive deposits.

Mr. FESS. That was probably not in it, then?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. That was probably not in it, then. And if it was confined to $50,000,000, it was not contemplated to loan to the banks that had taken securities of war industries.

Mr. FESS. Would the chairman mean by the statement a moment ago that originally that might have contemplated only loaning to banks, and then later on taking in the larger field?

Would I understand from that that these exceptional cases, where the corporation will loan money directly, will measure the additional amount that was not originally considered?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. What I intend to convey is that while I never heard of this original limit of $50,000,000, if any intelligent man in or outside of the Treasury Department contemplated the vast advances and the vast aid to be rendered to industries contributory or necessary to the prosecution of the war and thought they could do that with only $50,000,000 as the limit, he was a financial idiot, almost. It could not be done.

Mr. FESS. What had the committee in mind when they reduced the issue from $4,000,000,000 to $2,000,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. We thought it would be a safer proposition; that the corporation would be better protected; and that in many ways it would be better. For instance, we thought if we left the limit at $4,000,000,000 there would be a hundred times more applicants for those loans. If it was left at $4,000,000,000 many would think that we had piled up a mountain of greenbacks and money down in Washington and would say, "We will come in and get our part."

Mr. FESS. Have you any assurance that that will not come about anyway?

Mr. KITCHIN. And another thing: We thought that with bonds of $2,000,000,000, with $500,000,000 to back it, it would be better than to authorize an issue of $4,000,000,000. For instance, say I was worth $100,000. My note for $10,000 could be more easily sold and at a less rate of discount than if I were to give a note of $50,000 or $75,000. We thought the bonds of the corporation would be more salable and would come less in competition with the sale of Government bonds under a $2,000,000,000 limit than under a $4,000,000,000 limit. It occurred to us, too, that if it became necessary at a later time for the Treasury Department or for this corporation to issue more than $2,000,000,000 to aid industries requiring aid, after the corporation had loaned out or advanced, say, $1,500,000,000 they could come back to Congress, and after Congress had looked over the reports and had seen that this $1,500,000,000 had been wisely conserved and expended in accordance with the provisions of the act, that Congress would, if necessary, grant authority to issue additional bonds.

Mr. FESS. I think this change that the committee made is one of the most important that was made, and the reason why I asked the ground for your cutting it down was that I wanted to know whether you thought $2,000,000,000 would be sufficient when they asked for $4,000,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Entirely so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Warburg stated that the Secretary of the Treasury expected that at no time would there be more than $2,000,000,000 outstanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the matter that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has just mentioned I would say that in my judgment from the beginning the amount of capital provided for this corporation has been altogether too large. In England provision was made under the name of the "British Trade Corporation" for the creation of a corporation for somewhat similar purposes. The total capital of that corporation is only $50,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Will not the Member sometimes get an idea of confusion of lack of discrimination between the war-trade bill in England and this particular bill? There is a very wide difference, is there not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; there is a very wide difference. That was made practically for the purpose of advancing overseas transactions, but I am unable to go into those details at this time. I intended to call the attention of the committee more particularly to another matter.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that I am frightened at these enormous appropriations that are being made for corporations to be carried on under the direction of the Government at this time. We appropriated $500,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on the railroads. We appropriate in this bill $500,000,000 more, a total of $1,000,000,000. One-fourteenth of the highest amount that I have heard fixed for the next liberty loan is to go into these two items alone. Where is this thing to stop, gentlemen, and how is this Nation, with all of its enormous resources, to provide these prodigious sums that are being continually called for? I say we can not go on in this manner. In my judgment the amount of capital provided in this bill should have been much smaller. It is entirely unnecessary that we should have this amount.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] the other day when he said that the almost immediate demands upon this corporation would be for $4,000,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has stated the reason why this bill has been expanded, I have no doubt, but he has also stated one of the chief objections that can be made against the bill. The moment you start with Uncle Sam paying expenses, then the whole country descends upon you and wants to have money for all conceivable purposes. I have said before, and I say it now, that instead of this corporation being a national one, and one carried on by the Government, it ought to have been a subsidiary corporation to the Federal reserve bank—a private corporation—then it would not be expected that the Government would furnish the money for every project that had become in some way involved and was having difficulty in obtaining credit.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman explain how a demand for $4,000,000,000 is to be taken care of by the organization of a corporation with only $2,500,000,000?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have not undertaken to explain that. I say these demands are too much, that they ought not to be made, that the Government ought not to undertake to provide any such sum, and undertake to supply every demand that may be made for funds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to mention at this time another matter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on yesterday, as I remember, said that this bill was a species of camouflage. Some one remarked at that time that the word "camouflage" has been somewhat overworked of late, and I entirely agree with that statement so far as this bill is concerned. Whatever may be the objections to this bill, whatever may be its faults, its defects, or its merits, they are perfectly apparent. The Ways and Means Committee have taken every pains in the world to make all of its provisions as clear as possible, and the purpose and intent of the bill shines out in every paragraph as clear as a star on a winter night. There is no reason for anyone mistaking the purpose of this bill or misunderstanding it. The purpose for which it may be used is there, the appropriation is there, and the object is perfectly plain and clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: Page 2, line 11, after the word "subscription," insert "by installments."

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, the subscription is made at one time, and I take it that the intent is to call this subscription by installments or by percentages, and that is the purpose of my amendment. If you will examine the language of the bill you will see that it refers to one act of subscription, and then it says subject to a call or calls at such time or times as may be deemed advisable.

That is all I desire to say. I trust my amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman's amendment proposes that the subscription may be paid in installments?

Mr. DILLON. That is what I propose.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. They can call for it in installments now, as they need it.

Mr. DILLON. The subscription is one act, and I want to put in the words "by installments," so that they may be paid in that way as called for.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, his amendment would clarify the section if further on in the same section it was not perfectly plain, and so stated, that—

Such subscription shall be subject to call * * * at such time or times as may be deemed advisable.

That means in such amounts, from time to time, as the Secretary of the Treasury and the board of directors may determine. The gentleman's amendment mystifies it. It says "in installments." That might mean that they must make a rule that the installments should be in certain fixed amounts. As it is, they may call for it as the condition of the finances of the Treasury may justify. Evidently the gentleman overlooked lines 17, 18, and 19, which make it perfectly clear that they can call for it in such amounts at such times as they think proper. After making the appropriation, this is the language:

the sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making payment upon such subscription when and as called.

Mr. DILLON. I think the gentleman is correct in regard to that. I had not noticed those lines.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman's amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. DILLON. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the management of the corporation shall be vested in a board of directors, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall be chairman of the board, and four other persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than three of the five directors shall be members of the same political party. No director or officer of the corporation shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interests, or the interests of any corporation, partnership, or association, in which he is directly or indirectly interested; and each director shall devote to the business of the corporation all of his time not devoted to the business of the United States. Before entering upon his duties, each of the four directors so appointed, and each officer, shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he will comply with the provisions aforesaid, and he shall also take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. Nothing contained in this or any other act shall be construed to prevent the appointment as a director of the corporation of any officer or employee under the United States or of a director of a Federal reserve bank.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as this section was originally presented to the committee it provided, as every one will remember, for the appointment of the other directors by the Secretary of the Treasury, and their dismissal at his pleasure. I think that the change in this provision has greatly improved the bill, and I think it will be found, with reference to this change, as with reference to the other changes made by the members of the committee, that in no case has the efficiency of the bill or its power for good been limited or decreased in the least by these changes. If it be so found, I assume that those changes will be approved.

In discussing this matter a short time ago the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] referred to the powers which were conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act, and stated that in his opinion the powers which were given to the Secretary of the Treasury under that statute were much larger than those sought to be conferred by the bill under consideration. I do not so view it. The powers that were conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act were more in the nature of a limitation on the acts of others. The gentleman from Virginia gave the impression to the House, although perhaps he did not so intend, that the Secretary of the Treasury under the Vreeland-Aldrich Act could determine just which banks should belong to the association which might obtain the benefits of this act. Such is not the case. The Vreeland-Aldrich Act provided in the first section thereof that certain banks, specifying them, might form credit associations; and the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury applied only where some bank had been excluded from these associations and wished to join them, in which event, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and upon proper application, it might be permitted to join. So in various parts of the bill it provided for the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, and for control by him where privileges had been abused by some other party.

It was not so much the conferring of power upon the Secretary of the Treasury as it was the limiting of the powers of others and preventing the abuse of those powers under the provisions of the act. So far as I know, no objection was ever made against the Vreeland-Aldrich Act that it conferred too great power on the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill we are now considering confers extraordinary powers on the corporation thereby created and its directors, even as it stands. In this particular case, under the section we are now considering, if the Secretary had been given the power not only to appoint co-directors but to remove them at his pleasure, it is obvious that these men would have been but dummies; there would have been in fact one sole director, because the others would be absolutely surservient to his wish. No such power as that was ever conferred on a director of a great institution, and ought not to be conferred in this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

Of the four directors so appointed, the President of the United States shall designate two to serve for two years, and two for four years; and thereafter each director so appointed shall serve for four years. Whenever a vacancy shall occur among the directors so appointed, the person appointed director to fill any such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term of the member whose place he is selected to fill. Any director shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States. Three members of the board of directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that in the appointment of the members of this board the Secretary of the Treasury will be one, the Comptroller of the Currency the second one, and the vice governor of the Federal reserve bank the third one. That leaves two men to be appointed. I do not intend to suggest or dictate as a Member of Congress, but I want to call attention to the fact that in the selection of these other two men that they ought to be representatives of the great business interests of this country.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think that the Comptroller of the Currency can be one? He has been appointed chairman of the purchasing board of railroad supplies. Does not the gentleman think that would be enough in addition to his other duties?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have never heard anyone suggest that the Comptroller of the Currency would be appointed; in fact, I have not heard but one man suggested. I am pretty certain that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President are going to try to find the best qualified men to have on this directorate that can be found in this country. If they do not find well-qualified men the Senate will not confirm them. The President will have to pass on them, and perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury would naturally have some suggestion to make, but the nominations must pass in review of the committee of the Senate, and then in executive session the Senate will confirm or reject the appointments.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am glad the gentleman from North Carolina has made that statement. I hope his prediction will be proven. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the four directors of the corporation appointed as hereinbefore provided shall receive annual salaries, payable monthly, the amount of which shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States, not exceeding $12,000. Any director receiving from the United States any salary or compensation for services shall not receive as salary from the corporation any amount which, together with any salary or compensation received from the United States, would make the total amount paid to him by the United States and by the corporation exceed the amount fixed as the annual salary of a director of the corporation, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerks' desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, strike out after the word "monthly," all down to and including the word "exceeding" in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

Mr. KITCHIN. How will it then read?

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the four directors of the corporation appointed as hereinbefore provided shall receive annual salaries, payable monthly, of $12,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to that amendment. I think we will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in any city or cities of the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, lines 22 and 23, after the word "offices," strike out the words "in any city or cities of the United States" and insert the following: "such cities as have been designated as Federal reserve cities," so that the section as amended would read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in such cities as have been designated as Federal reserve cities under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the disposition to create offices has grown upon us. I believe we should not indulge it too much in this bill. If the paragraph is permitted to stand as it reads, it would be within the power of the corporation to establish a large number, an unlimited number, of branch offices and agencies throughout the United States. I hesitate to say it, but it is a fact that during the last two or three years, since we have been creating commissions of one kind or another, a large number of cities, boroughs, hamlets, and villages have been designated in one way or another as Government agencies, and that carries with it the employment of a vast number of men and women. Take the Food Administration, for instance, and the Fuel Administration, which are doing more or less useful work just now. It developed that they, while intended for useful purposes, have from necessity or otherwise employed substantially 5,000 men and women in all the cities of the Union, covering all sorts of places, byways, and highways. If commissions we create are to continue and we are to employ people by the thousand under the present auspices, it will not be long before almost every man, woman, and child in the United States will be a Government employee. I question whether that is a good thing, economically or politically.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to have the gentleman, a member of the committee, explain the necessity for any branch office under a bill of this kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I question whether all the business done by the corporation could not be done in the city of Washington; but it may be that some corporation out in Oregon or Washington may desire to present a claim to some agency nearby rather than to come to Washington and present its claim here.

Of course any corporation that needs help from this war finance corporation ought to be ready to bear the expense of a trip to Washington to get it, but local conditions and local environment will have their influence with regard to these loans. I have contended right along that the Federal reserve bank ought not to be so far dissociated from the operations of this corporation that it can not advise the local banks or that the local banks can not advise the Federal reserve banks or that in turn they may not advise the board here in Washington as to the financial standing of the people away back yonder who want to borrow money. The amendment I have offered proposes that the number of agencies to be created by this war finance corporation shall be limited to 12, just as the agencies of the Federal Reserve Board are limited to 12. We gave the reserve board the option of creating from 8 to 12, and they at once seized the opportunity to create 12. That was supposed to contribute to the convenience of the people having to do business with the banks. If we limit the number of agencies of this war finance corporation and put them in the same cities in which the Federal Reserve Board has located its agencies, then we will really work an economy, because the Federal reserve bank is best posted as to the financial standing of the man who desires to borrow money. If he is a man unable to get money from the banks, the banks ought to at least be consulted as to whether it is wise to make that loan. It seems to me the machinery would move smoother, it would be more economical, to have these war finance corporation agencies located alongside of or within the existing agency cities of the Federal reserve banks. The two are going to work together anyway, and probably they ought to work together for consultation purposes and to exchange information.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire what the gentleman includes in the term "Federal reserve cities"? Does he limit that to the original 12 cities where the Federal reserve banks are located?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I think that would add to the convenience of all sections of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman in his remarks in favor of this amendment referred not only to the cities where Federal reserve banks are located, but also where branch banks of the Federal reserve banks are located.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If I said branches I meant those cities designated as Federal reserve cities.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, under the law there is nothing known as a Federal reserve city.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I am pleased for once in my long legislative experience here to be able to correct the gentleman from Wisconsin. I hold in my hand the Federal reserve act, which, in section 2, provides that the Federal reserve bank organization committee shall designate "not less than 8 nor more than 12 cities to be known as Federal reserve cities."

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Wisconsin stands corrected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the finest tribute——

Mr. STAFFORD. That has ever been paid to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; to the fairness of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. Chairman, this is a business proposition, and it seems to me wise and in the line of efficiency and economy.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, personally I do not pretend to know whether this corporation would need more or less than 12 branch agencies. I do not think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] knows, and I do not think anybody in this House at this time can form any definite judgment as to how many branch agencies the corporation may need to carry on its business properly. I presume the Secretary of the Treasury does not know now how many branch agencies are needed, and he does not know now where they will be most needed; and I can see no reason why Congress should limit the number of agencies at this time. It is purely an administrative feature of the bill as to how many branch agencies will be established, and I certainly think that we ought to assume that the corporation would establish no more branch agencies than are necessary to carry on its business and that they would put them where they would best facilitate the business of the corporation. It does seem to me that branch agencies will be necessary. It would be a great hardship for people to come from long distances in this country to Washington to negotiate loans from the corporation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. In just a minute. It is true, if they are in great need of money, they would be willing to pay the expense of coming to Washington for the purpose of securing a loan; but if there are no agencies throughout the country, necessarily the corporation must then be at the expense, which I dare say would be greater than the maintenance of branch agencies, of sending inspectors and investigators throughout the country to see whether loans ought to be made and determine the value of securities offered. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not all this be simplified if we accepted these Federal reserve cities as locations for the new war corporation branches and used the machinery of the Federal reserve, which is to be a part of this system, to ferret out and acquire information?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It might be that that would be a very good plan, as far as it goes. It might be determined that it does not go far enough. It might turn out to be very important that there should be an agency in some of the other larger cities of the country, and certainly agencies established in large cities where there are no Federal reserve banks could better ascertain the necessity of the loan or the value of the securities offered than the Federal reserve bank could. Many important industrial cities have no such bank. Many war industries are located in these cities, and an agency of this corporation would be of great help to those industries.

Mr. GLASS. Is not that demonstrated by the fact itself that the Federal Reserve Board has established agencies in such great cities as Detroit? Would not an agency of this corporation be very apt to do very much more business in Detroit than in Atlanta or in Dallas or in Richmond?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I should think so. It seems to me that the needs of this corporation can not be fully understood at this time. It seems to me, further, that if a branch could be established at some great city where there would be possibilities of loans being made by the corporation, the mere fact that there is an agency in that city where the war industries know and understand they can go for relief would give confidence to the financial situation, that would steady business, to the end that it might relieve this corporation of a great deal of business that it would otherwise be called upon to transact. It being an administrative feature, it seems to me it will be wholly unwise for the House to undertake to limit the operation of the corporation by prescribing in the law where it shall have its corporate representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I think this bill is an emergency measure. I think it is a war measure. I think it is necessary to have a corporation or some other kind of an organization in order to furnish the means to properly conduct and carry on this great war. I think the terms of the bill in relation to establishing these agencies provide a better means than is provided by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The purpose of furnishing this money is to supply and aid our war industries with means to manufacture and furnish ammunition to win the war. It seems to me that the corporation board of directors itself is the one to determine the places where that money is most needed and can be used and utilized to the best purposes, and that should be where these great war industries are being carried on. At the centers of these great war industries are the places where the branch corporation should be established. For that reason I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] ought not to prevail. Now, I want to answer another question. It was asked here this morning about how much money will be needed. Some one has suggested that we should have not only $2,000,000,000, but it should be increased to $4,000,000,000. Well, I will tell you just how much money we should have. We should have enough money to whip Germany.

Mr. BURNETT. How are we going to get it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How does Germany get it? Earn it. We are worth twice as much as Germany. We produce and add to our national wealth forty billions each year. I, for one, stood here and I voted all the resources of my country for the purpose of bringing Germany to her senses. That has proven to be no small undertaking, but before I would submit to the yoke that Germany has put upon Belgium I would be willing to forfeit not only everything I possess but I would subscribe to the principle of our forefathers and pledge my life, my fortune, and my sacred honor. This war is a war of principle which we are fighting. We are fighting the most delusive, the most unfair, the most barbarous enemy that ever conducted a warfare. While we are trying to observe some of the principles of international law and decency, they are not reciprocating or observing either international law or the laws of humanity. We can not trust our enemy. He boasts about his agreements being worthless, mere scraps of paper. If Germany wins, the world is at her feet; we lose our Republic and civilization is turned back to the olden days of the feudal lords. I think the amendment of the gentleman ought not to prevail, and this corporation that has to furnish these funds ought to be the one to determine the places for establishing these loaning institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, while I, with other Members of this body, voted to mobilize the resources of this country to prosecute this war waged against Germany to a successful termination, I have to submit that the question at this time is not so much the question of mobilizing of these resources as it is the question now of distributing some of these resources that we are mobilizing by taxation and through the sale of liberty bonds. And when it comes to that matter this body ought to have a little something to say about it, and we ought to throw about this distribution and this system of favoritism that we are creating here all the possible limitations that we can possibly devise. It is rather amusing to me to note how difficult it is for some gentlemen to maintain their consistency here in the support of this measure who, on January 4 last, when the proposition was up here to divert $200,000,000 of the money in the United States Treasury raised by taxation or by the sale of bonds to the farm-loan banks of this country it was then argued in another body of this Congress and upon the floor of this House that the offering for sale of the farm-loan bonds at that time, when we were offering to sell liberty bonds, would be an unpatriotic act. It was stated that it would prevent the sale of liberty bonds; that it would increase the interest upon those bonds to allow these farm-loan bonds to be offered, especially at a higher rate of interest; and yet we find the same gentlemen to-day say that if you only give this corporation $500,000,000 of the people's money it can throw upon the market $2,000,000,000 of bonds other than liberty loan bonds, and I believe it is argued now it will stimulate the sale of liberty bonds, even though bearing a higher rate of interest. When the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] made the statement that it would increase the interest of liberty bonds and cost this Government millions and millions of dollars more, these same gentlemen who made the argument January 4 last before this House scoffed at the remark. However, I will admit that something should be done possibly in this critical moment, but I rather agree with the gentleman from California. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said that these agencies ought to be where the Federal reserve banks are located so that they could advise one another. The truth of the matter is you do not expect those $2,000,000,000 of bonds to be sold to the general public. You expect this Federal Reserve System to raise this money. You have merely in an indirect way adopted the principle of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. If I understand, you are going to allow men who can get enough credit to procure these bonds to bring all the old junk in the country to the extent of 133 per cent to go to a Federal reserve bank and receive currency on it. If that is what you wanted, why not amend the Federal reserve act? What is the use of having all this camouflage and these other agencies provided and this great expense upon the Treasury?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that a thing worth 133 per cent would be classed as old junk?

Mr. SWITZER. No; if it is worth that, but it is just simply a question of value that is put upon it. It developed in the hearings that a railway system in Michigan—the matter was brought out before the Ways and Means Committee in the hearing that it did not have a franchise, and that is brought in here as evidence that this bill should become a law.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I will.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the gentleman think these $2,000,000,000 are going to be placed on the market at one time—all of them—as the gentleman indicated a moment ago?

Mr. SWITZER. I do not.

Mr. McCORMICK. That was the inference to be drawn from the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. SWITZER. If the report of the hearings is correct, as it has been stated here during the consideration of this bill, the danger is imminent that the bonds are going to be put out in large amounts; millions and millions of dollars will be thrown upon the market soon, and will be thrown upon the market at a time when we are trying to raise money by the sale of liberty bonds in order to prosecute the war.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. Is the gentleman going to vote for or against the bill?

Mr. SWITZER. I am not right sure. [Laughter.] I possibly may vote for the bill, but I would rather vote for a proposition that would so amend the Federal Reserve System as to allow this agency we created some years ago and which has now had a wide and broad experience to administer this act. I think it is better capable of doing it. I see no reason why these gentlemen should not administer it justly as wisely, and more wisely, than some new corporation you create here to meet the exigencies of the Government on the spur of the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, I hope the gentleman, since he has been speaking on section 12 and we are on section 6, and five or six pages will have to be read before we reach that subject on which he is talking, that he will not talk any more than that time on it now.

Mr. SWITZER. I wish to say to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee——

Mr. KITCHIN. The real point that I want to make is that just as soon as the gentleman finishes, let us get through with the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Ohio proceeding for two minutes more? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWITZER. I wish to say to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that I have been detained in my home on account of trouble with a tooth for the last 8 or 10 days, and I was not able to be here during the general debate except for a short time yesterday, and I had scarcely any time in general debate. And I was following a course of procedure for which a precedent had been set for me, and was delivering myself of a few observations that I thought I would like to make to this body.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have heard it stated here once or twice, and I heard you make a remark to that effect, that there is a railroad up in Michigan that has not any franchise. I wish to know whether or not you know about that?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Michigan apparently is not acquainted with the franchise of the Detroit United Railways that controls the railway systems in the city of Detroit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I deny that there is any railroad operating in Michigan without a franchise.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not acquainted with conditions in his own State.

Mr. SWITZER. Now, while I am on my feet, I desire to recur to that old hobby that I have advanced here two or three times, and I want to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee whether or not his committee is going to give any consideration to these people who are petitioning his committee to have the time extended for the payment of the excess-profit tax? I have people in my district who state to me, and they are just as loyal as the people in any district and are not seeking to avoid payment of the tax, that they want temporary relief.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We all have them.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is not pertinent to this bill. I will write the gentleman a letter about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SWITZER. All right.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] in reference to the throwing of $2,000,000,000 of bonds, or $4,000,000,000, if that is the amount that will eventually be agreed upon—this bill calls for $2,000,000,000 of bonds—upon the market, and floating subscriptions, and that sort of thing, it seems to me wise that the House should understand exactly what is expected to be done with those bonds. They are not to be sold in the general market in the ordinary sense that a man goes into an exchange and invests $1,000 or $2,000 in a bond. It is not the intention to have this bond a general marketable bond. As I understand it, the bond is to be used solely as collateral. It will have a marketable value not less than par as provided in the bill.

If a company or a bank comes to this newly established board and endeavors to secure a loan, that loan, not being in the form of cash, can be in the form of a bond, which later on the borrower can use as collateral to secure cash from, not a business transaction in the sense of the purchase or sale of a bond, as such is known in the general market.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. The truth of the matter, then, is that you expect to raise this money from the Federal Reserve System by using these bonds as collateral?

Mr. TREADWAY. Not at all. The gentleman considers that that represents $2,000,000,000 of cash. It does not. It simply represents $2,000,000,000 of credit, which further can be used to a greater extent for credit through loans in the various banking channels of the country. It will not, as the gentleman conceives, tend to concentrate cash when we want to subscribe cash for liberty bonds, but it will make more credit and release money that can be used for liberty bonds, actual cash, whereas this is solely collateral. I think there is a very marked distinction between the idea that the gentleman has of this bond in the general bond market and the actual use that this bond will be put to.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand it, these bonds are not to be sold to individual investors?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is my understanding of it. I think the chairman of the committee will confirm it. They are not expected to be in the ordinary sense, as I endeavored to explain, a purchasable, marketable bond. It is, of course, expected that the bonds will be negotiable, and undoubtedly there will be sales from time to time.

Mr. SNELL. What, then, does the Secretary mean in his statement before the committee, when he says?—

> The intervention of a corporation of this character, with its large capital, will provide the class of security which will appeal to the minds of even the most timid investors, and will naturally assist in converting what might become a dangerous bank expansion into a legitimate investment of free capital. Even though the corporation were not called upon to make any considerable advances itself, so that the issue of its own securities to a large extent might not be required, it has been the experience in Great Britain, and I believe it will be our experience also, that the restraint imposed upon unnecessary capital borrowings, through Government intervention such as is proposed, not only allays the fears of timid investors but stimulates a demand generally for issues of licensed securities. Such securities sell promptly and their distribution is general and effective. This again provides a check to unwise expansion of bank credits.

Mr. TREADWAY. That confirms exactly the idea I have of it—that the bonds can be used as collateral security for further loans in the local home banks by borrowers through this banking corporation.

Mr. SNELL. He further says, in substance, "This will stimulate a demand for general issues"—of this corporation, as I understand it.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is a difference between the bonds and the cash. Cash can be secured to the extent of $500,000,000. That is the capital of this corporation. Then the bonds, as the gentleman of course understands, are an entirely separate thing.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to understand whether or not these bonds can be sold on the market.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is my understanding of it. I will be glad if the chairman will explain it, if I am in error. While the bonds will be negotiable, as I have stated, it is not expected they will be largely dealt in on the various exchanges.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the modus operandi of these bonds it is this: The borrowing institution will come to the corporation and say it wants a million dollars. The corporation has not the money, but it advances to this borrower a million dollars of its bonds and takes a secured note for the direct loan. Then this borrower takes the bonds to a bank and gets money on them. If the borrowing institution desires to do it, it can sell the bonds of the corporation to the investor and get the money in that way. Most of the loans will be made by advancing bonds of the corporation, and at the same time if the corporation desires money, and has use for actual money, it will sell to investors or to the banks.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Some of us are not clear on that. The corporation will issue bonds for what—the unsecured note?

Mr. KITCHIN. For the note with security.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then, the financial corporation lends its superior credit to the private corporation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is right. And you must understand always that when the corporation makes a direct loan, such as the gentleman mentions—as the gentleman must comprehend the object of the bill clearly, and no doubt he does as clearly as I do—it means that under the provisions of the bill the borrower must put up its note, and, in addition, security amounting to 133 per cent of the amount advanced. For instance, if the Dupont Powder Co., for example, wanted to borrow $10,000,000, and the corporation did not have the money, the corporation would issue $10,000,000 worth of its bonds. The Duponts would give the corporation their note for $10,000,000, and, in addition to that, security amounting in value to 133 per cent of the amount advanced.

Mr. McCORMICK. The chairman of the committee has made very clear that operation. Will he not make equally plain, in as few words, the operation when the private corporation applies through the bank?

Mr. KITCHIN. When the private firm or individual applies through the bank, one of the methods of procedure under section 7 will be as follows: The bank will make a loan to the industry contributing to the prosecution of the war. The bank will then bring the note of the borrower to the War Finance Corporation, together with all the security which the bank holds as collateral for such note. The bank will give its note to the War Finance Corporation, secured by the note and security of the borrower, and receive from the corporation an advance equal to 75 per cent of the loan made by the bank to the borrower. The advance may be in money or in the bonds of the corporation.

Mr. SNELL. Is it understood that these bonds will be listed and dealt in as are liberty bonds and other bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If the gentleman has correctly stated the modus operandi, as he puts it, it is a little different from my standpoint. I do think the business will be carried on largely as the gentleman suggests, but this corporation can go on the market and sell these bonds wherever it can find purchasers?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. The corporation has got the power under this bill to sell its bonds or to dispose of them in any way it sees fit.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That is what I was trying to get at.

Mr. KITCHIN. When the corporation needs money it can put the bonds on the market, or sell them to an investor. But I think it was illustrated by Mr. Warburg in his testimony by practically the illustration I gave a while ago, without mentioning his name, that the large part of the business is contemplated to be done by advancing the bonds of the corporation.

Mr. SNELL. Then if it is possible to sell them, they will probably be listed on the stock exchange?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. They have that power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine that they are going to sell some on the market, because they must have some money in addition to the $500,000,000 of capital stock after they are in operation a year or two.

They may sell bonds either publicly or privately, but it is provided that they must sell them for not less than par.

Mr. SNELL. He says:

Such securities sell promptly and their distribution is general and effective.

I should think from that that he intended to distribute them among general investors.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, surely.

Mr. KITCHIN. In every way.

Mr. SNELL. Then Mr. TREADWAY's position that they are not for sale is incorrect?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. TREADWAY, as I understood him to intend to convey to the House, said it is contemplated that the larger part of their business will not be selling the bonds and getting the money and loaning the money direct, but in advancing these bonds. Mr. Warburg said that, too. But they can do just exactly what the gentleman says, and sometimes they will do it. Whichever way they think is necessary or wiser to take care of the war industries they will pursue. They have the power to do it in either way.

Mr. PLATT. Since we are talking about section 12, that provision in section 12 that they may be offered for sale publicly, and so forth, does the gentleman regard that as vital to the bill? Why not strike it out?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think they ought to have authority to sell privately or publicly, just so they are sold not below par.

Mr. PLATT. They can put the rate of interest high enough to sell them at par.

Mr. KITCHIN. I expect that many individual investors will buy them, just like they buy liberty bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that the amendment be read again, since the discussion has taken a different range.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 4, lines 22 and 23, after the words "offices in," in line 22, strike out the words "any city or cities of the United States" and insert the words "such cities as have been designated as Federal reserve cities."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that it will read——

The Clerk read as follows:

So that the section as amended will read:

"SEC. 5. That the principal offices of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in such cities as have been designated as Federal reserve cities, under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 8, noes 41.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 4, line 21, strike out the words "District of Columbia" and insert "city of New York."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this is a great financial institution, a tremendous bank of banks. There is no good reason why it should be located in the city of Washington, which is already overcrowded, and which is not nearly as accessible a place as the city of New York. It should be located at the financial center of the country, where all great financial enterprises obtain their capital. There is no reason why it should be in the District of Columbia, except that the Secretary of the Treasury is chairman of the board of directors, and he is in New York almost as much as he is in Washington. When the directors meet he could just as well attend a meeting in New York as here. Business men from all over the United States will be coming here and overcrowding the hotels, trying to get accommodations from this corporation, which ought to be located in the financial center of the country, New York City. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to purchase or lease and hold or dispose of such real estate as may be necessary for the prosecution of its business; to sue and be sued; to complain and defend in any court of competent jurisdiction; to appoint, by its board of directors, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of the business of the corporation, to define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, and prescribing the powers and duties of its officers and agents.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 5, line 13, after the word "directors," strike out the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if this section is permitted to remain in this bill not a single by-law can be framed, adopted, amended, or repealed without the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Not a single duty can be prescribed for any officer or agent without the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not believe it is essential that this language should remain in this section. I believe it would be infinitely better to leave out this language, for there is nothing peculiarly within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that warrants him in having any more to do with the framing and prescribing of the by-laws, or under the by-laws prescribing the powers and duties of the officers or agents, than of the other four men who are on this directorate with him. The gentleman from Ohio this morning stated that there were but three places in this bill now remaining where it provided that such and such action should be taken with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. There are four places, this being the first one. In my opinion these words should be eliminated, for there is no reason why these other gentlemen who are selected as members of this directorate should not have as much voice in framing and prescribing or in amending or repealing the by-laws for the conduct of the prudential affairs of this corporation as the Secretary of the Treasury himself. There is no more reason why the Secretary of the Treasury should have supreme power in prescribing and declaring what shall be the duties of the individual officer than any other director should have, and it occurs to me that if this corporation is in fact to be conducted as other corporations are conducted in the United States, this language should be eliminated, for it destroys the very character of a corporation when you are placing all the power with reference to the formation of it and the conduct of its prudential affairs, with reference to the finding and prescribing the duties that its agents are to perform, in the hands of one man. I think it would be infinitely better if this language were stricken out, and it would tend to strengthen rather than weaken the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If this amendment is adopted and those words are stricken out, the Secretary of the Treasury will still be on the board of directors and will have a voice.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; and he will bring to the board all the peculiar knowledge that he has by reason of his office. Further, all the other directors, who will be selected by reason of their business prominence and vast experience, should have a voice in the determination of these matters. If they do not, of what consequence are they as directors? What will all their ability and business experience avail if they are permitted to have no voice in framing the by-laws for the control of the prudential affairs of this corporation?

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. FESS. In the creation of the board the principle was that each member should be coordinate; that the Secretary of the Treasury should not be superior to any member of the board, but equal to him. Does not this make them in a sense subordinate to the Secretary of the Treasury, if your amendment is not adopted?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; it occurs to me that it takes the virtue out of the bill so far as having the combined experience of men who are to act for the good and common weal of the Nation is concerned. So I say if this is to be a representative corporation, as corporations are supposed to be representative, then this language should go out.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman a question and submit a suggestion. I agree with the gentleman in this proposition. It seems to me that if the Secretary of the Treasury has the approval of the by-laws he has absolute domination over the corporation. If he can make the by-laws, he can control the corporation. It seems to me that way, and I presume it does to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is my idea. I am offering it for the good of the bill, for I believe that gentlemen are trying to get the best possible bill to do this emergency work, and especially, if it is to inspire confidence in the people, it is because of the fact that it is made up of a number of gentlemen whose combined wisdom they are looking to instead of one man. I care not how wise that one man may be, he may lack in the special knowledge that would be of consequence to the framing of by-laws or prescribing the duties of men, which peculiar knowledge another director may have. There should be no dummies on this board, and no one should have autocratic power over it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This is a case in which I can not agree with my colleague from Indiana. The committee did what it could to limit the power of the Secretary of the Treasury over this board. It limited his power with respect to financial transactions generally, but in this instance the committee felt that it was proper that the Secretary of the Treasury should be consulted. For instance, it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be consulted as to "by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, and prescribing the powers and duties of its officers and agents."

Why not? Why should not the Secretary of the Treasury have submitted to him for approval, he being the representative of the United States, the by-laws governing the corporation in which we are placing $500,000,000 of the people's money?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Would not the by-laws be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury as a member of this board?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and as such he would have a voice in them, but as Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the direct representative of the Government on this board, he should have the right to say whether the rules and regulations of this corporation conflict with the interests of the United States, which has $500,000,000 invested here.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Another question. What purpose would the other four directors serve?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They can prepare the by-laws, work under them, and agree with the Secretary as to the business to be done. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is it not a fact that the Government of the United States is the only person or corporation financially interested in this corporation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Up to date; yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is not the Secretary of the Treasury the only official on the board that is in any way responsible?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true, as to Treasury money; but all will be responsible.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I submit to the gentleman whether it is true that the Secretary of the Treasury is the only official that has any responsibility for this corporation. If we left the bill as it originally came to us, he would be the only man that had any responsibility in connection with it. But let me submit this in reference to the gentleman's amendment: It would be a proper subject of the by-laws to determine where these branch offices should go, what cities they should be placed in, how many cities should have branch offices—would it be better to leave that to the Secretary of the Treasury alone, and if we do leave the by-laws subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury he can determine just where these branch agencies shall go? As an illustration, would the gentleman say that the Secretary of the Treasury alone and not other members of the board should have the decision of determining where they should go?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will answer by asking the gentleman this question: Would the gentleman vote for a provision in the bill to give the four men on this board the right to adopt and put into effect regulations for the expenditure of this money in spite of the Secretary of the Treasury; would the gentleman do that?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman in his statement goes right back——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To the very marrow of the matter.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Goes back to the question of whether you are going to make the Secretary of the Treasury the whole thing in this corporation. I say no; that the Secretary of the Treasury should not have the sole voice in it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I realize that there are some gentlemen who do not want the Secretary to have too much power. I am one of them. There are many gentlemen on this side who do not approve of the great grant of power thus far given to the present Secretary of the Treasury. But I am looking at this proposition as one who penetrates the future. There may be other Secretaries of the Treasury. There is no political meaning in that. But no matter who the Secretary of the Treasury is, he is the custodian of the funds of the Government. He holds the purse strings; he is the man whom we hold responsible for the money which we collect and which we appropriate, and I do not care to put it in the power of five men, of whom he is one only, to enact rules and regulations for the expenditure of money appropriated to an independent corporation that may run counter to the United States Treasury.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman cite any corporation, private or public, where the power to make by-laws is vested in one man, when there is a directorate of five men, all of whom are appointed with equal power, but with no power to make by-laws?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can point to J. P. Morgan & Co. I suggest that nobody in that corporation would appropriate large sums of money or make any large contracts without the approval of J. P. Morgan, the head of the concern. I will point to the great Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and suggest that the board of directors, nor any combination of the board of directors, would undertake to do vital business of that road without the approval of Samuel Rea, president of the company. I will point to various other institutions where big business would not be done without the approval of the head of the concern.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has so many duties that he never in the world would be able to have anything to do with the making of these by-laws, and that somebody else would make them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a popular impression with respect to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LITTLE. If that is true, why had we not better designate the person who is going to do it instead of putting it up to a dummy figure?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. McAdoo is not a dummy.

Mr. LITTLE. Is he not in this?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not boosting Mr. McAdoo, but I would admonish the gentleman that Secretary McAdoo is no dummy. Anybody who picks up Mr. McAdoo for a dummy will drop him like a red-hot poker.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that in this business he will be a mere figurehead?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think the Secretary of the Treasury could be regarded as a figurehead; he is a pretty live wire.

Mr. LITTLE. I am asking the question for information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I am not boosting the Secretary of the Treasury, either.

Mr. LITTLE. I concede that he is, as you say, a wise man. I was not looking for information on that. I am posted on that myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman led up to it unconsciously; that is all.

Mr. LITTLE. What I am trying to get at is this: Is it not a fact that he has so many other duties that when it comes to writing these by-laws he will not have more to do with it than you or I?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Even so, he is still the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LITTLE. Is not that job enough for any man on earth, anyway?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It certainly is. The Secretary has plenty to do, and I am not sure he is hunting trouble. He has plenty to do, but he is not disassociated from the Treasury of the United States. He is still in control there.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to say to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Treasury is the healthiest looking overworked man that I ever saw.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was verified by a critical observation of the gentleman before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Who is the sole and only stockholder in this corporation that you are talking about?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean the Morgan concern?

Mr. GORDON. No; I mean the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was thinking of the great law firm of Gordon & Black, of Cleveland, Ohio, and I was wondering whether, Mr. Black being dead, Mr. Gordon would not have to be consulted before any business is done. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Is it not a fact that the Government of the United States is the sole stockholder in this corporation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly. The gentleman is right, as the gentleman frequently is. The United States has an investment of $500,000,000 in this corporation, and that is all the money there is in it at the present time. There is to be no more money except such money as is raised upon the strength and credit of that $500,000,000, and that money has got to come out of the Treasury—not all at once. I want Mr. McAdoo, the Secretary of the Treasury, to check that out carefully. I do not care to have four other men dictate to him that they shall have $500,000,000 all at once, when they may not need more than $100,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one minute more in order to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question: That being the case, why the other four directors?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because Mr. McAdoo could not attend to the details of this business, and the judgment of the four other directors will be highly important and extremely valuable in the conduct of the business. They are to be experienced men to advise with the Secretary of the Treasury, if need be. They will give hearings to individuals and concerns desiring loans and attend to other matters. The whole thing is this: Do you propose to give $500,000,000 of public money in a lump sum to four gentlemen constituting an independent corporation and say they shall not consult the Secretary of the Treasury? And if the Secretary of the Treasury says they do not need $500,000,000 in a lump sum, but only $100,000,000, so far as the Treasury interests are concerned, do you mean to say you will vote to give $400,000,000 additional to this corporation, a private corporation, in spite of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury? I do not propose to do it. I would put this additional check upon the Treasury of the United States——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given one minute. I would like to ask him a question. I will ask for a minute myself in order to ask the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the Committee on Ways and Means, and, of course, he is posted as to this bill. He has just said that Mr. McAdoo would not attend to the details of this business. Just what is he actually going to attend to in reference to this business?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will read the bill carefully——

Mr. LITTLE. I have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will observe that, as a member of the corporation, Mr. McAdoo will be required to join with his fellow incorporators in the conduct of this business. It is patent that he can not attend to all the details; but, from my point of view, they are going to transact big business, and the Secretary of the Treasury should know about it.

Mr. LITTLE. Just what is he going to do?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will read the bill——

Mr. LITTLE. I have read it. But he is not going to attend to it in detail. The gentleman has dismissed him from attending to a large part of such details——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If somebody comes from Kansas City, Kans., desiring a loan, and the board is in session, they will consult with the board without it being necessary for Mr. McAdoo to be present. And——

Mr. LITTLE. That is the information I want to get.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And, I presume, that board, if it proposed to lend a city like Kansas City, Kans., so large an amount as $100,000,000, would first consult Mr. McAdoo before making him pay over the money.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not know; they borrow a great many millions there—the big packers and millers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a great city, and they are great borrowers. We will admit that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, just a word in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. As I stated this morning, the bill as originally submitted to the committee contained the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury," as I recollect it, about 17 times. Thus this board could do absolutely nothing except with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; in other words, he had the absolute veto over any action this board might take.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Now, this gives him power to approve or disapprove the by-laws. Does not the gentleman from Ohio think that the striking out of that clause in this bill in the other 16 places is of very little importance unless we strike it out in this?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Because this gives him absolute control over this corporation. He can approve the by-laws under this provision, and when he has done that he has determined the entire policy and the entire method under which this corporation shall operate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I can not quite agree with my colleague. My mind has been running in this way: I do not believe that any human being—I have the highest regard for Mr. McAdoo; if it had been a Republican Secretary of the Treasury with this new machinery to be given into his charge I would have thought the same—I do not believe that any human being ought to have the power of absolute veto, particularly in cases where it involves the use of his judgment as to the advance of credit to this man or the withholding it from that man. So, after much consultation in the committee, we came to this sort of general understanding, that where it was a case of determining a fixed line of policy the Secretary of the Treasury ought to lend his approval to that policy. This machine, while apart theoretically from the Treasury Department, is nevertheless intimately interwoven with it in its various functions. In the question, for instance, of determination of interest on these bonds to be issued by the corporation, it seemed to us that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to lend his approval to the rate of interest in order that the issues of those bonds might not conflict or be in competition with issues of liberty bonds and other obligations of the United States. For that reason we left it as it is. Now, this particular section simply applies to by-laws laying down a general policy to be pursued by this corporation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think right there my friend inadvertently misquotes. The by-laws hardly go so far as to confer any power; in fact, on the contrary, they do not relate to powers at all, hence it would be somewhat doubtful whether they would really pertain to the policy of this corporation. They would regulate the manner of the meeting and the calling of the meeting, the time and places when they should act and the manner of bringing up motions and all that referred to the manner of carrying on the business, but not to powers conferred or powers to be exercised.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I can not read this provision in any other way than merely a provision determining the general policy to be pursued by these directors. Here is the provision:

And to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, and prescribing the powers and duties of its officers and agents.

I can see no danger in giving the Secretary of the Treasury the power of veto over any set of by-laws which, in his judgment, might be prejudicial to the interests of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, this provision was one of the provisions that was left open for the free action of the members of the committee to oppose on the floor of the House. I think probably a large majority of the Members of this House or this committee at different times have drafted by-laws for corporations. I think it is very simple here to see just what we are doing. We have organized, if this becomes a law, a great corporation, and the first thing to do is to say who will manage the corporation. Now, the management is vested by this law, which will be the charter of the corporation, as provided in section 3, and is as follows:

That the management of the corporation shall be vested in a board of directors—

Consisting of whom?—

consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall be chairman of the board, and four other persons.

The only difference in the grant of power to control is that one of those five is especially designated as chairman. Now, then, if we intend to say that this shall be given to the control of one man, and that four individuals shall be granted unto him as mere company and as a matter of entertainment during the meetings of the board of directors, it ought to be left as it is. But the management is given to these five men with apparent coordinate and equal powers, except the chairmanship being given to one. We come to section 6, where it says:

That the corporation shall be empowered—

And so on, and down to where the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana comes in, where it says:

and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors.

In other words, when this corporation is organized, before it can do any business, before it can hold a meeting, before the meeeting can be conducted, before any determination can be taken with reference to any business whatever, the by-laws must be presented, must be prescribed, as it were. These four men, each a $12,000 man, equal in salary to the Secretary of the Treasury, equal in integrity, equal in ability, as managers of that bank, come in and agree that they shall hold their regular meeting on Wednesdays. The Secretary of the Treasury says, "No. Wednesday is 'meetless' day; we will not meet on that day." They say, "Then we will meet on Saturday." "No," says the Secretary; "we will not meet on Saturday, as that is also 'meetless.'" And so for the whole week. And it is within his power to say that there shall not be a meeting day fixed by this corporation. Then, coming to the question of when they should pass upon their loans, there ought to be rules and regulations for that. They present the most reasonable rules, and four of them say, "It is reasonable that the loans should be considered; lay them over for one week and investigate them by the committee." No; that can not be done, because the Secretary of the Treasury under this says you shall not consider loans.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then, what is the purpose of making the Secretary a member of the board?

Mr. SLOAN. So that he may be one member of the board, and not the board.

Mr. McCORMICK. And regularly in attendance at meetings.

Mr. SLOAN. The difference is simply this: We want to make him a member of the board. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] wants to make him the board. I think that distinction is clear.

Mr. PLATT. Would the gentleman say no loans could be made on porkless day?

Mr. SLOAN. No. I will simply confine myself to "meating" the question. This corporation is to be at Washington, not at Hog Island. The section says, "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury." That means now, for instance, if they would start out, all in good humor, and agree upon a set of by-laws under which they would be permitted to dispose of the $500,000,000 of capital of this corporation, and suppose things should go not so well, and they find they ought to amend it. They could meet on another day and adopt another order of business, and a rule for shorter terms, better security, and greater care of securities. However imperative the necessity for amendment, the four members would be powerless over the objection of one member who happened to be chairman under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORDON. May I interrupt the gentleman at that point?

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman may.

Mr. GORDON. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he were to invest $500,000,000 in a corporation such as this, and nobody else was putting in the money, would he not feel that he would like to have the final say as to by-laws?

Mr. SLOAN. But this is not the money of the Secretary of the Treasury. This is the money of the people of the United States.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no; the Government of the United States.

Mr. SLOAN. And the Congress of the United States, acting for the people of the United States, takes this $500,000,000 and places it not under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury but under the control of five men, every one of them as good a man as the Secretary of the Treasury, and each one with the same authority. And those five men, with equal responsibility, should be allowed to be coequal in the conduct of affairs.

Mr. MOORE of Pensylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will be pleased to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman misinterpreted me a moment ago when he said that I wanted the Secretary to be the board. And I call the gentleman's attention to section 2, where it is provided that this appropriation of $500,000,000 shall be available at such time or times as may be deemed advisable, and only with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Does not that illustrate what I was trying to say, that the Secretary of the Treasury should be consulted as to the rules. Because the appropriation is not to be available at once, and should not be available in lump until the Secretary of the Treasury approves.

Mr. SLOAN. I agree that the Secretary of the Treasury should be consulted. Each of the other four should be equally consulted. But it is not a consultation that is granted to him. It is giving him absolute, arbitrary power instead of a consultation. If these by-laws for any reason need amending, four members are absolutely powerless.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not my colleague draw any distinction between the power of approval of a set of regulations that have been drafted and the power of the original draft of those regulations? The gentleman states that the Secretary of the Treasury is so powerful; that therefore he prescribes the rules and regulations, whereas all this does is to require his approval of a set of regulations drafted by the others.

Mr. SLOAN. Why, the law says one of five managers, when a proposition is presented to him by a majority, will have the power to say, "I will not accept it." We grant this power to these five men. You practically take it away from four entirely and invest it in the fifth man. I quite agree with the gentleman—I have forgotten who it was—that it was practically bootless to have taken away the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury in these 14 or 15 places and leave it here from the beginning in his power and discretion to say, first, that there should or should not be any by-laws adopted. That if he should consent to the adoption of a set of by-laws they would become as the laws of the Medes and Persians, which change not. And if a by-law controlling the business of the corporation were adopted, however obnoxious it might be to the business of the country, or however much it might obstruct the business of this corporation, four members of that directorate could not compel its amendment. It gives absolute power to the Secretary of the Treasury to lay down the manner and plan of conducting the business.

Gentlemen seem to confuse this with the idea that the Secretary of the Treasury is the one person who is in control of this $500,000,000 because it is the property of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury is not in control nor is he entitled to the custody of the property of the United States. The large majority of the property of the United States he never saw. A large majority of the property of the United States he never will see and will never have possession or control of. As Secretary of the Treasury he has no more control of the money placed in this corporation than he would have of a United States battleship paid for out of the United States Treasury or of the Virgin Islands for which the Treasury paid $25,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, with all deference to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], with whom I usually agree, it seems to me that this is a case of "much ado about nothing," and arises entirely from a mistake as to what these particular provisions apply. These provisions have nothing to do with what loans shall be made or who shall receive the loans. Those are covered by other paragraphs of the bill. They do not pertain to the amount which shall be approved. All these matters are to be determined by the whole board of directors, without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. In short it has nothing to do with the powers which are to be exercised by this board. It does not in any way limit them or expand them, and the only power it confers on the Secretary of the Treasury is to say, as my friend indicated—he might desire that the board should not meet on Wednesday, or he prefer that they should meet on Saturday.

What extraordinary power is that? What does that amount to? He might say that the order of procedure of business should be such and such. What difference does that make? It pertains only to the manner in which the business shall be transacted, the plans for which must be presented to him for his approval.

My own idea is, as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] in this connection, that he probably never will draft these regulations at all; that they will be submitted to him for the purpose of ascertaining whether they agree with his convenience or with the convenience of his office in connection with the other business that he must transact. These additional powers here amount to nothing except as they relate to the manner of the transaction of the business.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In reading section 6 I thought originally that the approval of the Secretary had to go to all the orders included in the paragraph. In rereading it it seems to apply to lines 12 and 13.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman has on the rereading come to the correct conclusion and the only conclusion that can properly be drawn. Of course, if it applied to all the powers and privileges that are covered by this paragraph, it would be very different, but I can not see how that construction can possibly be put upon it.

Mr. FESS. If it is limited to that, it would not give to the Secretary the power to dominate the board in all matters.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; it would not.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. I would like to ask the gentleman if my interpretation, as I shall state it, is correct?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. WINSLOW. Assuming that the five directors adopt by-laws, and so forth, is it not a fact that, at a later time, if four of them should feel that the by-laws were insufficient and ought to be modified, regardless of their unanimous opinion, the one member could check the amendment or repeal of the whole or a part of the by-laws?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is correct about that. But, as I said before, that relates only to the time and manner in which the business shall be transacted and not to the business itself.

Mr. WINSLOW. To stick to the point at issue, is it not a fact that the by-laws, when once adopted, can never be amended or repealed unless one man against the other four, if he happens to feel that way, agrees to it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. They could not even be adopted without his assent, but that does not show that the matter is of any importance.

Mr. WINSLOW. Now, under section 3, if this bill passes and that section stands, we shall have five men designated by this act to run the affairs of that $500,000,000 corporation, and has not every one of those five as much responsibility and as much accountability to the Government of this country as any other one?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is perfectly true. But what responsibility attaches to the question of whether or not the board shall meet on Wednesday or Friday? Or what responsibility attaches to it as to whether the order of business shall be, first, the reading of the minutes, or something else?

Mr. WINSLOW. I do not think there is any responsibility as to that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is all that this provision pertains to. The matter is of no importance except that it makes the transaction of business subject to the convenience of the Secretary and the other demands on his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given three minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is no trouble about this bill, if I understand it. I read from section 3:

The management shall be vested in a board of directors.

Who are the directors? The Secretary of the Treasury is one and four are to be appointed.

Now, if you will turn clear through the bill, you will see under section 7 that "the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to make advances on such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe." The Secretary of the Treasury can not make any advances.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Read section 6, the last half of it.

Mr. CANNON. I will read section 6, page 5:

That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to purchase or lease and hold or dispose of such real estate as may be necessary for the prosecution of its business; to sue and be sued; to complain and defend in any court of competent jurisdiction; to appoint, by its board of directors, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of the business of the corporation, to define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, and prescribing the powers and duties of its officers and agents.

Now, that is merely to provide as to its general business, its days of meeting, and so forth. Does the gentleman claim that you can make a by-law that will nullify the corporation? If you can, then one of two things ought to be done, or there is but one thing that ought to be done: If the by-laws can overcome all these different sections where the corporation has power to turn down the Secretary of the Treasury, then you had better, if you want to give supreme power to the Secretary of the Treasury, discharge and cut out of the bill these four unnecessary people.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If that is all the purpose, then why should the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury be so important with reference to the adoption of the by-laws?

Mr. CANNON. I do not think it is of the slightest importance whether he approves them or not.

There are to be five directors. So far as the by-laws are concerned, they can not be made to conflict with the law, and the law declares all through it that the corporation shall tell when and to whom advances shall be made. It seems to me that we are quarreling about a thing here that does not amount to anything.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think it is of some importance, when this very section provides that these by-laws shall prescribe the powers and duties of the officers?

Mr. CANNON. As against a positive provision of the law?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. You must read these different sections together. This section is the one that limits the other sections with reference to fixing the powers of the agents and officers; and under the by-laws that can only be done with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not a single duty of a single officer can be delegated to him without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. Why, the law itself——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That section is the law.

Mr. CANNON. The law itself determines what the corporation shall do.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That section is the law with reference to that.

Mr. CANNON. Even if the gentleman were correct, the whole act would be construed together.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what I am asking the gentleman to do.

Mr. CANNON. The whole act must be construed together, and I would be glad to know what members of the committee intended when they said that the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to make advances from time to time, and that the corporation shall be empowered and authorized in exceptional cases to make advances directly to any person, and so on, clear through.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HELM. It is an old saying, and I think it has its applicability in this case, that a stream can not rise higher than its source. In other words, no by-law that this board can pass can be of superior force or repeal or affect in any way the powers conferred on anyone by an act of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I quite agree with the gentleman in that. If the Secretary of the Treasury, without action by the corporation, which means three of the directors for a quorum, should authorize an advance you could go into any court and enjoin the advance. I have no doubt about that as a legal proposition.

Mr. HELM. In other words, the by-laws can not exceed the powers conferred by this act.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. That is the way it seems to me.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I intend to vote for this bill, and I do not intend to vote for any amendments unless the same are recommended by the committee reporting this bill.

I have voted for all the war measures recommended by the administration, and intend to do so until this war is fought through to a successful conclusion. It is the only way to win this war. I consider this bill a part of a scheme for the successful prosecution of this war, and it should be supported and will be supported by a great majority of the Members of this House.

This bill is recommended by the great Ways and Means Committee of this House, and I must confess that some of the ablest Members of this House are on that committee. It is their judgment as to what is best under the circumstances.

We will hold the President responsible if this war ends disasterously to this country. We look to him as our constitutional leader in this great conflict.

We should give such power, authority, and means as are necessary to carry on this war efficiently and successfully.

There have been some measures before this House that I did not feel were necessary, but I felt that perhaps those higher up, who were in possession of more information than I, knew better what to do and what was best for the country.

As a Member of this House, I want to do what is best for my country in this crisis, and I am not here to set up my opinions against the combined opinion of any committee that recommends legislation here. I might feel that my ideas were better, but I am willing to yield my personal views on many matters to the combined judgment of this House, or to the President and his Cabinet.

I have on numerous occasions paid my respects to the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. KITCHIN, and alongside of him I place the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from my own State [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause.] As I have said, I have voted for all war measures and intend to do so, and I am not going to go through each bill with a fine-tooth comb to see if I can find fault with some part of the bill. All measures depend upon the honest and wise administration of such measures when enacted into law.

We hold this administration responsible, and we will hold it responsible for what is done in this war. We should not hamper the administration in trying to do the things which it deems essential for the successful conclusion of this war, and if this administration fails to so properly advise us, then we will hold the administration responsible. But to growl and whine about this part of a bill or that line or some other word, or this clause is no part of the duty of a Member of this House in this crisis. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is useless for gentlemen to undertake to minimize the importance of the by-laws of a corporation. If what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has said about the functions of the by-laws of this corporation is true, of course this clause ought to go out. If they simply determine the question of when the board shall hold their meetings and similar questions, the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to be annoyed by it, and the gentleman's remarks answer his own argument. There can not be any serious question about the functions of the by-laws——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman think that the Secretary of the Treasury will have no interest in the time when these meetings shall be held?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. There will not be any dispute on that. Any one of them would agree they should be held when it is convenient for all. These men will be too big to quarrel about that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There will not be any dispute about anything.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If the Secretary has the power to make the by-laws, it would be useless for other members of the board to dispute anything.

I have no doubt that all five will agree as to when they shall have their meetings. It is idle for Congress to spend any time on that. The functions of the by-laws of a corporation are well known. They are important. They are the absolute authority for the action of the corporation within the law that creates it. They control the corporation. They are its rule of conduct. Under the by-laws of this corporation the entire scope of their action within this law will be determined. The by-laws will determine the manner in which they shall exercise the power given them by this law. The law provides that the by-laws shall determine the manner in which they shall exercise their powers. This bill expressly says that the by-laws, which must be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall determine the manner in which the corporation shall exercise its privileges under the law.

Mr. SNYDER. Would it not be possible under this grant of power for the board of directors in making up their by-laws to say that the Secretary of the Treasury should have full power to determine who should have loans?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think so. I think they could determine the character of the loans they will make and the character of the securities they will take. I think they could determine those things by their by-laws within the scope of the law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In verification of what the gentleman says, section 7 provides that the corporation may be authorized to make advances on such terms as the board may prescribe. Could not the Secretary of the Treasury absolutely dictate that matter?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. They could prescribe that in the by-laws, and the only limitation would be this law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. In a moment, please. The gentleman talked about the Secretary of the Treasury being the representative of the Government on this board. He is no more the representative of the Government than every other man on the board.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The other four men ought to have the same interest in the success of the corporation and the same interest in the relief that it is proposed to offer to the business interests of the country. They will be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and they will be officers of this corporation. Certainly the President of the United States will undertake to appoint men whom we can trust, and on whom we can rely, just as much as on the Secretary of the Treasury.

I agree with what gentlemen say about Mr. McAdoo. I have a very high estimate of his ability, but he is not the depository of all the wisdom in the country. I dare say that many men can be found and men will be found to go on this board who are just as wise and who have just as much knowledge of the financial needs of the country as has Mr. McAdoo.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Does the gentleman consider the fact that Mr. McAdoo, in addition to being a member of that board, would also be Secretary of the Treasury, and does he consider the duties and responsibilities laid upon Mr. McAdoo as Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. As director of this corporation he has no duties to perform as Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Does he not go in there as Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. He is Secretary of the Treasury, and these other gentlemen, or some of them, may have official positions in connection with the Government. But as directors of this corporation they all have duties to perform which are wholly apart from other official duties. It is certainly wise to have the Secretary on the board, because of his superior opportunity to know the condition of the Treasury. He can advise them on that point, but that is no reason he should dominate them.

Mr. SNYDER. Is there anything in the law we are now considering that would made it impossible for the makers of the by-laws to fix it so that one member of that board could not be made the disbursing officer of the corporation?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That is a matter that would come within the scope of the by-laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman's answer to this question will settle the whole discussion. Would the gentleman approve of the adoption of a set of by-laws relating to this corporation which Mr. McAdoo, in the capacity of Secretary of the Treasury, would not approve?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Probably not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is all there is in this question.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No; it is not all there is in this question; because I would probably agree with the Secretary is no reason at all why I should be denied the right to differ with him if my judgment so prompted me. And we must not forget that it is not Mr. McAdoo to whom this relates. It is the Secretary of the Treasury on whom we are conferring power. That is Mr. McAdoo to-day, but who will it be to-morrow? We may be giving to some person, unknown to us all, practical dominion over this corporation which is to control the destiny of the business world. There will probably be no dispute between the other directors of the corporation and Mr. McAdoo as to what the by-laws should be. But the danger is to give this unnecessary power to anybody. If you have four men there, why is not the combined wisdom of all better than the wisdom of one man?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be, proposes to issue a liberty loan and make a heavy draft upon the public for that purpose. The board of four directors, not including the Secretary of the Treasury, make up their minds to make a large issue of corporation bonds about the same time, at a different rate of interest; does not the gentleman think it is important that the Secretary of the Treasury should be consulted in a matter of that kind?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Before I answer let me suggest this question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman agrees that that would be a subject matter to be covered by the by-laws?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not necessarily.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think he asumes that, or his question is not pertinent. I think it would, and it shows the importance of the by-laws. It disposes of the arguments of gentlemen who undertake to minimize the importance of the by-laws.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The clause we are discussing is this: "Subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed." I submit to the gentleman that in the rate of interest, if there are two conflicting issues of bonds, the rights of the Government, through the Secretary of the Treasury, ought first to be considered.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I desire to say that the four men—the members of the directorate—will have the interests of the Government just as much at heart as will Mr. McAdoo. [Applause.] Gentlemen assume that the four men on the board with Mr. McAdoo are going to be irresponsible men, not men accountable for their conduct, men not faithful to the trust imposed upon them. You have got to assume that when you undertake to say that Mr. McAdoo should control absolutely the methods of the corporation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Assume that you have got the four ideal men, this is an entirely new proposition, one never before tried; it is a new machine in the history of American legislation. Is it not conceivable that these four men might agree on a set of by-laws which for some reason or other might be very disadvantageous to the interests of the Treasury Department?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. They might.

Mr. LONGWORTH. All we are providing for is that in that event the Secretary of the Treasury may have the approval of it.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Ah, these four men might agree on a set of by-laws that would be very detrimental to the Treasury of the United States, but these four men are just one-fourth as liable to agree on such by-laws as is the Secretary of the Treasury, because they are just as wise as he is; they will know just as well what ought to be done as will Mr. McAdoo. The mere fact that they stand on one side of the proposition and Mr. McAdoo on the other, it does not necessarily follow that they are against the interests of the Government. I am going to assume that the President will appoint four strong, loyal men, and the combined wisdom of all of them should be made available for the success of this law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the gentleman from Illinois have one more minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Does not the gentleman think that the argument of the committee all the time is that it is discussing personal legislation, that inasmuch as it happens to be Mr. McAdoo just now, they are willing to go ahead, but to trust four other men not named, they hesitate? What would become of us if Mr. McAdoo died?

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana), there were 36 ayes and 73 noes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DILLON: Page 5, line 3, strike out the words "purchase or" and also the words "and hold or dispose of."

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to eliminate the power to buy and purchase real estate, but it retains the right to lease property for the purposes of the bill. This being an emergency measure and the corporation may commence liquidation within a few months, I think we ought not to grant the power, because there is no need of buying real estate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has it occurred to the gentleman that in the course of its business, some of which will undoubtedly include the acquisition of real estate, some of which may have to be purchased in the course of the business, it would be wise to keep that purchase clause in the bill? For instance, a loan is made to a concern which is unable to make good and a sheriff's sale may result. The property would have to be turned over.

Mr. DILLON. Yes; but that does not reach the point that I am making. The point that I am urging is that it is for the purpose of conducting the business. The point the gentleman refers to would be a mere incident that would grow out of the loan-making power. I do not seek to reach that question, but why should this Congress grant power for this temporary purpose and allow the corporation to purchase real estate all over the country? They can rent the real estate. They can rent whatever may be necessary for conducting the business, but there is no necessity to go out and buy real estate for the conduct of this corporation business, and this power ought to be eliminated.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It seems to me that to own real estate may be one of the vital things in connection with the conduct of this organization. It may advance money and be compelled to take real estate to satisfy the loan. If it should take it, it ought to have the power to lease that real estate while it conducts the business of the corporation. Then it ought to have the power to dispose of the real estate that it takes, and to eliminate this language from the section now under consideration would be to restrict the right of the corporation to protect the interests of the country whose money it is using in the conduct of the corporation's business. What we should do is to broaden the power of the corporation rather than to restrict it. We ought to give the corporation every power necessary to recoup on any loans that it may make. It will have undoubtedly the right to foreclose if it should take a mortgage.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. My amendment does not seek to reach the question of foreclosure. That is a mere incident. It follows that the Government would have the right, the corporation would have the right, to take over the titles, but I have reference to purchases for the purpose of conducting this business.

Mr. MADDEN. This language does not mean that at all, in my judgment. The purchase may mean the right to acquire title. That would be classed as a purchase, and the acquisition of the title would be to protect the interests of the Government against loss on any loan that the corporation may make.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the stories that we have been hearing about rents in the District are true, does the gentleman not think, in order to protect the Government, that we ought to give them the power to condemn as well as to purchase?

Mr. MADDEN. We ought to give them any power that may be necessary to conduct this business without loss. While I am on my feet talking about purchase I hope I shall not be considered as going outside the field of discussion when I say that I do not think we would have any such trouble as we have now in the District if we should make the headquarters of the Food Administration and several other administrations elsewhere than in the District of Columbia.

We ought to have established the headquarters of a lot of these bureaus in other sections of the United States where rents are cheap, where people can be found to work, and not center all of the activities of the Government in the city of Washington, where there is no place to house those that come and where rents are exorbitant, and where there is a disposition on the part of the people of the city of Washington to impose upon the Government. Men and women are idle everywhere else in the United States; buildings are idle, easy to obtain at normal rents, and the people everywhere in the United States would be glad of an opportunity to work, and I commend to the executive authorities of the Government the suggestion of dividing these activities of the Government among the great cities of the country, so that all sections of the country will have an opportunity to contribute to the war and to its success and not impose these unusual burdens on the people of Washington, who seem to take affront at having them here.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. If we should scatter these around, the chief job would be for the poor people to haul the bonds, and that would give labor to the common laborer.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not quite grasp the purpose of the gentleman's question, but I am sincere in my suggestion that we ought to distribute the activities of the Government throughout the country and not try to center them all in the city of Washington. There are a great many bureaus here that are not needed here. They might just as well be anywhere else. They would perform better work somewhere else and we would get better results.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think we could actually reduce rents in Washington if we distributed some of the governmental work now centered here somewhere else?

Mr. MADDEN. We would reduce the rents and find opportunity for housing people here on reasonable terms. We would reduce the cost of food; we would find employment in other sections of the country for people who are now idle; and we would prevent the necessity for transporting people from every section of the country to Washington, and we could transact our business by mail with the headquarters of these different bureaus distributed all over the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. And that is where they ought to be. If an activity is one that can carry on its work successfully in New York City, that is where the bureau ought to be; if it is in Chicago, that is where the bureau should be; if it is in Denver, that is where the bureau should be, and so on all over the United States, and what I am saying now is said with the hope that those who are in the responsible charge of the Government will take notice of it and try to so distribute the war activities of the country as to impose the least possible burden upon the Government, facilitate the transaction of the Government's business, and at the same time lighten the burden upon the people.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman know in the city of Pittsburgh there is a large building devoted to the Bureau of Mines that could well house the Mining Department?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. And in the city of Chicago there is a building for the Food Administration——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would ask for two minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. I know there are buildings everywhere throughout the United States except in Washington. Here there seems to be a combination of owners of property who are imposing upon the Treasury of the United States by charging exorbitant rents; and while we have to build temporary buildings here we might just as well put them somewhere else. We are expending millions of dollars for the construction of those buildings, not one dollar of which would need to be expended if we would give proper consideration to the questions involved. We will have a bill here in a few days—a housing bill for the city of Washington, to accommodate those who have come here. We would not need to expend that money and make that charge against the people of the United States if we used wisdom in distributing the activities throughout the United States. I call the attention of the House to this because I believe it is important. It should have been done from the start, but it is not too late, for we are going to have more and more people called from every section of the country into these activities, and we ought to put them at work where they live rather than bring them here where they will not have a chance to live on what they get. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk began the reading of section 7.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ROBBINS. To offer an amendment to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait until the section has been concluded.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is this bill being read by paragraph or section?

The CHAIRMAN. By section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then we have not yet concluded the reading of the section.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can offer his amendment after the completion of the reading of the section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But we have not read the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so held.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to make advances, upon such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances:

(1) To any bank, banker, or trust company, which shall have made since April 6, 1917, and which shall have outstanding, any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association, conducting an established and going business in the United States, whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and evidenced by a note or notes, but no such advance shall exceed 75 per cent of the face value of such loan or loans; and

(2) To any bank, banker, or trust company, which shall have rendered financial assistance, directly or indirectly, to any such person, firm, corporation, or association by the purchase since April 6, 1917, of its bonds or other obligations, but no such advance shall exceed 75 per cent of the market value of such bonds or other obligations at the time of such advance, as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation.

All advances shall be made upon the promissory note or notes of such bank, banker, or trust company, secured by the notes, bonds, or other obligations, which are the basis of any such advance by the corporation, together with all the securities, if any, which such bank, banker, or trust company may hold as collateral for such notes, bonds, or other obligations.

The corporation shall, however, have power to make advances (a) up to 100 per cent of the face value of any such loan made by any such bank, banker, or trust company to any such person, firm, corporation, or association, and (b) up to 100 per cent of the market value at the time of any such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation) of such bonds or other obligations by the purchase of which financial assistance shall have been rendered to such person, firm, corporation, or association: Provided, That every such advance shall be secured in the manner described in the preceding part of this section, and in addition thereto by collateral security, to be furnished by the bank, banker, or trust company, of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors, of a market value, at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation), equal to at least 33 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation. The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 2, after the word "business," insert "or a business about to be established."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this amendment is quite obvious, because the way the bill reads there are but two classes of corporations that can have the benefit of it. The first are the corporations that have an established business and corporations that have a going business; in fact, it is really one class of corporations. If this war has developed anything more prominently than another it is the new inventions that have been brought forth; as for instance, the Browning gun, the explosive shell, the deadly gas, the improvements of undersea craft, improvements of the aeroplane, and so forth. Now, if an improvement of that kind is brought forth and patented, a genuine invention that it is believed will be to the benefit of this Nation in the war, this War Finance Corporation can not advance the money to a bank or trust company that has taken the paper or notes of the proposed corporation that is to be organized to put that new invention on the market, because it must be a "going business," it must be an "established corporation" before any advances can be made to it. Now, I do not know that there ought to be any objection to that provision being in this bill. It surely should not be limited, because it is a war measure, it is for the purpose of helping us to win this war, and why should we limit and restrict it to that class of inventions that are already established and not allow its benefits to be used for inventions that may be developed during the war for the use and benefit of the war.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is some business man out in the district I have the honor to represent who would like to put up and can whale meat, which is quite common. Would he be entitled to come in if the gentleman's amendment is added to the bill?

Mr. ROBBINS. Well, this corporation is to be handled by a board of five directors, four appointed by the President and one is the Secretary of the Treasury, and all of these inventions that present their paper for discount or ask credit are to be passed on by this board of directors. I think that is the purpose of the amendment. We can not legislate here as to what character of paper is to be taken. That is the business of the board of directors. The bill authorizes its directors to make by-laws and rules to govern its proceedings.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not the gentleman believe that if his amendment were adopted that it will absolutely destroy the very purpose of this bill?

Mr. ROBBINS. Why, no; it will only add to it another class of business, namely, new inventions that are about to be manufactured to the list that may be aided. It is to develop a new kind of enterprise that is not now established and a new product not now being made. Now, I do not quite agree with the chairman of this committee as to the operation of this bill. This bill is going to work inflation. If you will turn to the testimony that was given before the committee you will find, on page 64, the evidence of Mr. Warburg as to how this corporation is going to work. The purpose of this corporation is to advance bonds in exchange for the paper and bonds that are taken by this Federal aid corporation in helping companies that are engaged in making war munitions or connected with furnishing activities of war.

These bonds will be taken by banks, but no bank can take and invest all its money in bonds. It would have to close its doors. It would be compelled to suspend payment. What do they do? They take the bonds of these banks and trust companies that received them from war industries and take them for discount to the Federal reserve banks, and receive therefore Federal reserve notes and put them into circulation.

Mr. MADDEN. Not on the bonds.

Mr. ROBBINS. On the bonds or the paper of the banks together, no matter what it is. The thing that I inveigh against here, and the danger I see in enacting this law, is the great inflation that is going to result by the large increase of Federal reserve bank notes in actual circulation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have not much time to yield in five minutes. But I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman, and therefore I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the argument of the gentleman to be that if these inventors who are seeking to have their inventions floated by local capital can not secure support from the local banks they should come to this national bank?

Mr. ROBBINS. Under this clause of the bill they must go to local banks.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the gentleman's argument, he would come to the relief of such noted inventors as Mr. Giragossian?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not consider him a noted inventor. I do not know what he has invented. I mean by the amendment I offer only inventions of merit, the actual manufacture of which has not been begun on a large scale.

Mr. STAFFORD. Nobody else does.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman read section 9?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That relates to exceptional cases that I think would cover his point.

Mr. ROBBINS. I did not so understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. In the hearings this was a question that was asked about the expansion. Senator GORE asked:

It could only be used by the Federal reserve bank as collateral?

Mr. Warburg answered:

Yes, sir.

Then Senator SMOOT asked this question:

Now, when these banks take $500,000,000 of those bonds they, no doubt, will go to the Federal bank and get currency on that $500,000,000?

To which Mr. Warburg replied:

They might not get currency. They might want credit.
Senator SMOOT. Suppose they do get it?

To which Mr. Warburg replied:

Yes.
Senator SMOOT. Suppose they do get it; then, when issued, there is that much inflation of the currency.
Mr. WARBURG. Expansion.

They would get this $500,000,000 in these reserve notes, which would be added to the circulating medium of the United States. In the last statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, which I have in my hand, under date of March 2, 1918, as compared with March 1, 1917, we find that these Federal reserve notes have this year expanded to $1,442,088,335 in this country. On the 1st of March, 1917, there was only $338,934,225, and on the 1st of March, 1918, there was $1,442,088,335, or over a billion of expansion of our credit during the past year. Just think of this! If this wild inflation goes on—and somebody has well said that the printing presses are still running down at the other end of Maryland Avenue—and we adopt the scheme proposed in this bill, as Mr. SMOOT and Mr. Warburg say in their testimony, we would have "inflation" of the wildest kind. We are by this bill proposing to allow borrowers to take these bonds from the Federal aid corporation, take them around to the Federal reserve bank, and get Federal reserve notes for them, and put these notes in circulation. Therefore, gentlemen, we are going to have "expansion" here that may, unless restrained by the directors, bring on all the ills that expansion has always brought in this country—panic, financial distrust, and financial ruin.

But in explaining the fact that this corporation may lead to "inflation and expansion," as Mr. Warburg characterizes it, it must be understood that it is essentially a piece of war legislation and therefore must be enacted into a law. This, then, is war legislation and is to remain in force during the war only.

On page 64 of the hearings before the House committee Mr. Warburg makes this statement:

We are just now in a terrific state of inflation, worst that the world has ever seen, taking the world as a whole—not the United States, but the world as a whole.

Therefore the situation that confronts the United States is not different from that which confronts other commercial nations.

This bill is being enacted to meet a crisis that now confronts us.

In the first place, we have a large number of banks that are carrying the paper of corporations engaged in the manufacture of war materials. These corporations are solvent, but they are not able to pay their maturing debts as they fall due. Under the operation of the War Finance Corporation these banks carrying company loans can apply for relief to the War Finance Corporation and secure from that corporation against the pledge of utility or corporation bonds and notes of the member bank an equal amount of short-term bonds of the War Finance Corporation. The utility corporation would turn over its bonds for each of the maturing obligations delivered by the borrowing bank. In that way either the holder of the maturing obligation would receive in the form of securities guaranteed by the bank or the bank would receive the War Corporation bonds for the bonds of the borrowing companies that it had deposited. The banks could take these War Corporation bonds in turn and deposit them with a Federal reserve bank and get securities or Federal reserve notes, which are a circulating medium, in exchange therefor.

The Federal reserve notes are based on 40 per cent gold reserve and 60 per cent commercial paper, or, in this case, the notes of the borrowing bank would be perfectly secure. The safeguard against this inflation would be that the reserve notes could only be issued to the extent of the gold reserve held by the Federal banks; and while it is true the free gold is constantly diminishing, yet the limit at this time is two and one-half billion dollars, and beyond that there could be no inflation. The strict compliance with the law under which the Federal reserve banks operate is our only safeguard against inflation.

Inflation to that extent at this time of business activity would be about what the country could stand without overstraining our credit system.

The second class of borrowers, of course, are the savings banks, which are provided for in section 8 of the bill, and this provision is a very salutary one, because the liberty bond sales have caused large withdrawals of the deposits in these institutions, and if the next loan is to be floated at 4½ per cent the depositors in savings banks who receive but 4 per cent for their money will quickly convert their savings into liberty loan bonds, and this will drain the savings banks of their deposits.

Savings banks, to preserve their liquid capital, can take securities that they have to the Federal War Corporation and quickly obtain from it bonds, which they could in turn deposit in the Federal reserve bank and secure Federal reserve circulating bank notes therefor. In this way the solvency of our savings banks, which are very extensive, and all other institutions operating like them, will be preserved, and their capital, surplus, and deposits practically guaranteed.

This second great benefit to be derived from this corporation far overbalances any danger from "inflation and expansion." We have come to a time in this war when every step necessary, financially and otherwise, must be taken to prepare our Nation, equip our Army, and sustain our gallant soldiers who are fighting in Europe.

No one can halt now to speculate on events that may never happen. We are in the presence of a foe that menaces our liberties and our entire fabric of government and also organized society. Our soldiers have gone forth and are going forward to offer their lives in our defense and in the defense of our flag.

I have voted since the declaration of war for every measure that would protect our troops and assist in any way toward winning the victory over the Germans and the central powers. The administration wants this bill and deems it necessary to that end.

The President has asked its enactment by a letter to one of the members of the committee, and I shall zealously and earnestly support it, believing, as I do, that I am sustaining the President and the Government in taking another step forward in the direction of a complete victory for our boys in the trenches and for our flag on land and sea.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it may be that I do not have a clear conception of the purpose of this bill, but, if I do, then surely the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] will absolutely destroy every particle of virtue there is in this proposed law.

He speaks about inflation. If his amendment is adopted and every new concern in the country that may be organized by a lot of promoters shall be permitted to come to the Government of the United States to get their project financed, God knows where the end would be of a proposition of that kind.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am for the policy underlying this bill from, the very bottom of my heart. It may be that the bill is not properly drawn in every particular. There is no doubt but that the committee has amended it very wisely. I think they have acted judiciously when they have undertaken to throw around the financial institutions of this country, or, rather, the finances of the people, every safeguard that is possible. It is perfectly right and proper that the minority at all times should be jealous of the rights of the people when the majority undertakes to legislate, and should not spare criticism when justified by the facts. This bill is simply an emergency measure to tide the Government through this great crisis of war. How tide it through? By controlling the credit of the country, as proposed in the bill, by organizing a corporation into which shall be put $500,000,000 capital stock and authority to sell bonds of the corporation to the amount of $2,000,000,000 to replenish from time to time the fund of $500,000,000; to incidentally take care of the industries, the lines of business, that are necessary to help win this war, but primarily to control credits and absolutely prevent the diverting of the finances of the country in every direction into the hands of men and corporations who are not so patriotic but that they would exploit their Government and the people in time of war.

And again the purpose of this legislation is to invite the money of the people into this one great channel flowing toward the Treasury of the United States whereby the President and those under him, provided for in this legislation, may control the finances of the country in such a way that we can sell our bonds and furnish all necessary material and equipment and pay the soldiers who are fighting the battles of our country. [Applause.] And I as a Republican, forgetting all partisanship, feel that we must at this time trust the men that are at the head of the Government to administer this legislation wisely If they do not, if they fail in this hour of the Nation's great trial, then they will be overthrown the first time the people have an opportunity to get at them. For the time being we must trust them. I shall vote for the bill cheerfully, because I believe it is one of the necessary things we must have to safeguard the very liberty of our country in this hour. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PHELAN offers to amend by striking out line 23, page 5, and inserting in place thereof the following: "(1) To any bank or trust company established under the laws of the United States or any State thereof, or to any banker who is a citizen of or is doing business in the United States."

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to limit the banks and bankers who can get accommodations from the Finance Corporation to those doing business in the United States and those established under the laws of the United States or any State. As the bill is written, if I interpret it correctly, there is no limitation. The War Finance Corporation could loan money to a Canadian bank or to a bank in any other country in the world. That ought to be amended.

Mr. FESS. Why do you say "banker," using the term "banker"?

Mr. PHELAN. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman read the entire paragraph?

Mr. PHELAN. I have; but I may have missed something about it.

Mr. GARNER. I call the gentleman's attention to line 4, page 6, "conducting an established and going business in the United States, whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war." That would confine it to the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. That refers to firms, corporations, or associations. Those are war industries, the public-utilities companies, or something of that sort; but there is nothing in this bill, so far as I know, to limit the banks that can get accommodations under this proposed law to the banks of this country. I think there ought to be that limitation.

Mr. GARNER. The description of this banker is very plain. It is to "any bank, banker, or trust company, which shall have made since April 6, 1917, and which shall have outstanding any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association, conducting an established and going business in the United States."

Mr. PHELAN. Yes. It is possible that the Canadian banks might have loaned a good deal of money up in Detroit, for example, or some place like that.

Mr. GARNER. I do not know of any bankers making loans to the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, since we do not know, it is only safe to put in this limitation.

Now, there is another item, however, that I would like to ask the committee about. You have the word "banker" there now. If the word "banker" there means what it seems to mean, it means that J. P. Morgan & Co., or Kuhn, Loeb & Co. can get accommodation from this corporation. In other words, while you put a restriction around the corporation and say that only in such exceptional cases can the banking organization get accommodation from the War Corporation, a bank or banker can get the same terms as a national bank or State bank. Probably the committee has good reason for putting in the word "banker," but if the committee intends that the private bankers shall have the same accommodations as the banking associations and trust companies, we ought to say "banking firm, partnership, or bankers," because as the bill reads, I believe it would be construed to refer to a single individual. Is it intended to give this accommodation to private individuals?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if they have made loans.

Mr. PHELAN. Should you not insert "banker or concern"?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; "banker or trust company." If you will notice the testimony of Mr. Warburg, we went into that and raised that very question that the gentleman raises. We concluded that this would cover all private bankers and banks and banking institutions not organized as associations. We looked into that.

Mr. PHELAN. I think that ought to be put in.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no objection, and I do not think the committee has, to adopting substantially the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts by putting in on line 23, on page 5, after the word "company," the words "organized or established under the laws of the United States or any State thereof."

Mr. PHELAN. The same amendment ought to be made on page 6, line 7.

Mr. KITCHIN. "Any bank, banker, or trust company, established under the laws of the United States or any State."

Mr. GLASS. It should not say "establish a banker" or "organize a banker." God Almighty established him.

Mr. GARNER. You say "in the United States"?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; say "in the United States." Of course, a foreign banker may doing business in the United States. Say "any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States."

Mr. STAFFORD. That would not cover the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]. It would allow these loans to be made to branches of Canadian banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Such a bank might be doing business in the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. The actual location would be in the United States, but their organization and capitalization would be in a foreign country. What objection has the gentleman to the language suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts may again be read.

Mr. KITCHIN. To "any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which shall have made since," and so forth.

Another thing, while we do not intend it, when we really consider the proposition, why should we not accommodate the Canadian banks? What objection is there to it if a Canadian bank is willing to lend money to help a war industry in this country and put up its credit and its security and buy one of these corporation bonds? We are not going to limit the sale of corporation bonds to banks of the United States. We are willing to allow the Canadians to buy our bonds.

Mr. PHELAN. It is not a question of buying our bonds. It is a question of advancing money to them.

Mr. KITCHIN. They are advancing it. They must put up the security.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand this bill, we want to help the industries of this country that are necessary to carrying on the war. That is a big enough job of itself.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not concerned in trying to advance the industries that are established in Canada or foreign countries.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman would just read the bill, he would see that there is no necessity of that, because this bill in two or three places specifically confines the war industries. They must be war industries whose operations are in the United States—existing in the United States, and not a foreign corporation.

Mr. STAFFORD. What objection has the gentleman to the language offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no objection to the substance of it, and this provision will get the substance of it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], I believe, will agree that this is the substance of it, to put in after the words "trust company" the words "in the United States."

Mr. PHELAN. I think that will cover it, because I think no foreign banks can do business in the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, another thing: Adding the words "In the United States" will mean the same thing, because they will be doing business under the laws of the United States. If a Canadian bank were doing business in this country, it would have to get the privilege of doing business here from some State. They would have to be organized under the laws of the United States or some State, and it would be the same thing identically.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is without merit. I see no possible objection to loaning money to a Canadian bank, a branch of which has loaned money to a going concern engaged in war industry in the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. I really see no objection to it, because they are using their credit to help our war industries.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The cases will probably be very rare. I doubt whether there will be any such case, but if there is any such, what objection is there to our doing this?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am willing to accept that amendment, because cases of that kind are going to be very few and far between.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. KITCHIN. I move to insert, in line 23, on page 5, after the word "company," the words "in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that offered as a substitute?

Mr. PHELAN. I am willing to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts will be withdrawn. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 5, line 23, after the word "company," insert the words "in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to page 6, line 7.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have a note to offer the same amendment there, and if the committee will permit me I will make that motion now. I move on page 6, line 7, after the word "company" to insert the words "in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 6, line 7, after the word "company," insert the words "in the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee [Mr. KITCHIN] a question. Does he not think that the word "banker" in that same line should be changed to "banking house"? "Banker" means an individual.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will recall that we had this very matter up in the committee during the testimony of Mr. Warburg.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I remember it.

Mr. KITCHIN. In fact, the gentleman himself asked the question.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; I remember it.

Mr. KITCHIN. And he said that "banker" would, of course, include a firm of bankers like J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., or would include one individual banker, and I should think, myself, that it would.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I remember what Mr. Warburg said about it, and I made just this point, that the word "banker" could apply to an individual. He might have acted in his individual capacity, not as a banker, and still the use of that word there would cover that act. As I further remember, I think Mr. Warburg said it might be better to substitute the words "banking house." I am not sure about that.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I am not going to make any motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the distinction is this: When you say "bank, banking institution, or trust company," you mean an organized, chartered company.

The word "bank" includes a private banker. I know that is so in my State, for I was at one time a bank examiner for State banks.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the word "banker" include member banks of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I think that would cover them.

Mr. McFADDEN. Cover the member banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Sure; any bank or banker.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 5 after the word "notes," insert the following: "including short-term loans made for agricultural purposes, the proceeds of which have been used to purchase seed or otherwise directly to increase food production."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw that and let the gentleman have it out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in deference to the chairman of the committee I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing more important to the Nation at this time than any other, it is that we should be able to increase our food production that we may supply ourselves and our allies with sufficient food. I call attention to the fact that this amendment is restricted in its application. It only covers loans to banks that have made loans to aid in purchasing seeds, or for a purpose which has directly contributed to increased food production. I ask that the amendment be again read. I want you to clearly understand it. Then I want to know whether or not you will turn down this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield; I am in sympathy with the gentleman.

Mr. MORGAN. I want the gentleman's vote as well as his sympathy.

Mr. WINGO. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that class of paper is now eligible for rediscount by the Federal reserve bank under existing law. Why does the gentleman want to repeat the present law?

Mr. MORGAN. I am surprised that the gentleman from Arkansas should make such a statement because he certainly knows that the Federal reserve banks are not rediscounting the notes of the farmers made for such purposes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not want to let that statement stand. Will the gentleman name one single reserve bank that has refused to rediscount agricultural paper?

Mr. MORGAN. Can the gentleman tell me how many million dollars' worth of that kind of paper the entire reserve system has discounted?

Mr. WINGO. I am not interested in the statistics, but in practical relief.

Mr. MORGAN. While the Federal reserve act does make agricultural paper eligible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks, as a matter of fact, if the gentleman had pursued his inquiry he would have found that the Federal reserve banks have rediscounted the notes of farmers only to a limited extent.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman name a single one of the banks in Oklahoma that has had paper of that kind turned down by the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma allow me to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question? Do I understand the gentleman from Arkansas to say that the Federal reserve banks are rediscounting unrated agricultural paper?

Mr. WINGO. Not unrated.

Mr. SNYDER. Where do they get the rates from?

Mr. WINGO. The Federal Reserve Board has made farmers' notes eligible for rediscount at the same rate as commercial paper for the same time, and they are now being rediscounted from Oklahoma in the Federal reserve bank at Kansas City.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not the statistics at hand. I do know that the Federal reserve banks confine their discount business almost entirely to rediscounting what is known as commercial paper, and that term is well understood among bankers and the commercial world. The ordinary notes given by farmers to purchase seed, to buy implement and stock animals, or used to pay for improvements on land, or to employ labor, and to meet the household wants, covering 90 per cent of the loans obtained by farmers, are not commercial paper, and are not eligible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks. The agricultural paper accepted by the Federal reserve banks for rediscount is paper based upon transactions where agricultural products are the basis of a commercial transaction. Exporters, grain buyers, shippers, and middlemen, dealing in agricultural products, no doubt make notes eligible to rediscount by the Federal reserve banks. But the note of the average farmer is not commercial paper, and banks holding such paper can not use it at the Federal reserve banks. Now, the purpose of this corporation is to create an institution that may make advances to banks which have made loans to persons and corporations whose notes are not commercial paper. The corporation is to rediscount paper like the bulk of notes given by farmers, which is not commercial paper. I do not want any misunderstanding about this matter. I want the law made definite, specific, and certain. I do not want the rights of the farmers or the opportunity to increase food production to depend upon a construction of the statute. I want to make it plain that this big corporation, endowed by the Government with $500,000,000 capital and given extraordinary powers, shall not confine its benefits to the big commercial and manufacturing corporations, to the railways, public-utility companies, and savings banks. If there is any way that this war-finance corporation can contribute to increased food production, I do not want to see it refraining from action by reason of doubtful authority.

Mr. Chairman, I hope no one will interrupt me.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. For just one question.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman is a close student of finance and of rural questions, as his name indicates, for he is connected with the great Morgan family, but he has also introduced a very important bill for personal agricultural credits, and I want to know, if this amendment be adopted, whether or not it would not interfere with the passage, possibly, of his own bill to provide for personal credits.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank the distinguished gentleman from New York for his kind personal reference, but here is the point: Secretary McAdoo in the hearings—I can not give the page—was asked the question whether under the provisions of this bill agriculture could be given assistance, and, as I remember it, he expressed himself to the effect that it could. What is the condition to-day in North Dakota? The farmers are called upon to plant an incrased acreage of spring wheat. In certain sections they have not the money to purchase the seed, and, consequently, there will be a limitation on the amount of spring wheat sown. The local banks can not furnish the necessary seed. My colleagues from Oklahoma know well that in the western part of Oklahoma last year there were a number of counties in the same condition, when an increased acreage of wheat would have been sown if there had been some way whereby the local banks could have furnished the money to purchase seed. There is nothing improper about this amendment. It is confined simply to where banks have made loans for the purpose of purchasing seed or in a way that will directly increase food production. Oklahoma and North Dakota do not alone suffer occasionally from crop failures. Why is it that this great corporation which we are creating, and I think wisely, should not have the power, in its discretion, to help out the banks in any locality where it is necessary to have increased funds to purchase seeds or to do something else that will directly increase food production?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. For a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the bill provide for that very thing?

Mr. MORGAN. Does it? Does the gentleman say that the bill provides that they can make loans to banks and to farmers?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is not specifically stated in the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the point I want to make specific.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bill already gives you that.

Mr. MORGAN. It may be it does, but it does not specifically. I want the banks in agricultural districts to know that when they render financial aid to farmers for purposes which will contribute to larger food production that they can have the assistance of the war finance corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 20, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not want the opportunity to compliment the gentleman from Oklahoma to go by. I know how dear to his heart is the farmer. I know how he labors to obtain seed for the farmer, loans for the farmer, and other things for the farmer that the farmer needs. It might as well be admitted now as at any other time that the farmer has no more devout or devoted friend in this House than the gentleman from Oklahoma, the Hon. DICK MORGAN. In sunshine and in storm he seeks for the farmer those things that an unrelenting Congress does not seemingly yield. He fights on valiantly, confident that the farmers have rights, some of which may be superior to the rights of others. And I predict he will continue his fight until the last drop of blood leaves the veins of his body. But the gentleman can not get away without hearing a few words from the Secretary of the Treasury on this point. The gentleman apparently did not accept my suggestion that this bill provides the very thing for which he contends. He continued his eloquent and earnest plea for seeds and was supported on the vote by dozens of the other farmers' friends, who rose to declare their undying faith in the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Oklahoma. And there are some splendid and stalwart farmers' friends in this House—even from Pennsylvania they joined the cohorts. The bill, I am persuaded, contains what the gentleman wanted—the chance to borrow money for the farmer, for the farmer's seed, for the farmer's machinery, for everything that the farmer needs. But the opportunity to offer an amendment was not to be resisted. See yon gallery filled with admiring farmers, horny-handed tillers of the soil, their plows and harrows idle in the ground, while they listen to this great discussion and see these splendid Representatives rise in their defense. [Laughter.]

But the Secretary of the Treasury was asked about this matter before the Committee on Ways and Means. After all these other institutions were considered, the Secretary was asked this:

Would farmers come in under the scope of this bill, or a farmers' association?

And he answered:

I think farmers would have the right, of course, to apply for relief if they could not get credit through the banks.

Think of it! If the farmer has nothing on which his bank will lend him money except his splendid reputation and his host of congressional friends, he can come in under this bill and still get money.

But—

Says the Secretary of the Treasury—

But farmers are now very well provided for in other ways.

Would you believe it, that the Secretary of the Treasury, also a devoted friend of the farmer, would make such an admission—that the farmer had been provided for in other ways? What if such damning evidence should penetrate the district of the gentleman from Oklahoma or those North Dakota or Pennsylvania districts so happily represented here by the farmers' friends?

The Secretary was asked:

You think farmers have already been provided for through farm-loan banks?

And the Secretary of the Treasury, the friend of the farmer, almost as much a friend as the gentleman from Oklahoma, I would say, said:

Yes. But in an exceptional case—

Think of it, farmers' banks, farmers' appropriations, farmers' agricultural bills. Even these are not sufficient to shut out this new loophole for the wretched, downtrodden farmer.

The Secretary of the Treasury says:

But in an exceptional case a farmer could apply to the War Finance Corporation for relief.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman a true farmer's friend?

Mr. PLATT. I am, sir. I want to know whether as a farmer I can borrow money from this corporation to buy an automobile? I need one badly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman can, if he is a friend of the farmer, on proof being made that he needs the automobile for war purposes or that his automobile adds anything to the production of food for our boys "over there." That is all you have got to prove. But it is a poor farmer, indeed, I would say to my friend, who has to ask for an automobile.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman qualify?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, I qualify as an old practical farmer. Does it not say somewhere else in this hearing that all one needs in order to get a loan is a postage stamp? Does not the Secretary say that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not say it goes that far.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the House hearings—I wish I had them here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If a postage stamp will carry proof in this corporation that there is some farmer in the gentleman's State who can not borrow money at a local bank because he has not got anything to offer by way of collateral, and he can prove up that he needs the money for the purpose of raising food for our allies, possibly he could get some of these funds. Now, what more does the gentleman from Oklahoma want? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 2, after the word "business," insert "and including all agricultural industries."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are always entertained when we listen to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], especially when he discusses agricultural questions and particularly when he discusses the welfare of the farmer. If there is any friend of the farmer in this House, if there is any man in this House who is more deeply interested in the farmer in a way in which the farmer does not care to have men interested in his welfare, it is the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman says that this bill permits, as it is now written, that loans may be made to farmers. That is true. I think, however, that it is well to write in this bill in specific terms that it is the intent and purpose of this Congress to extend the benefits of this act to the agricultural industries of this country. I believe that it is wise that there be added to line 2, on page 7, after the word "business," the amendment which I have offered, "including all agricultural industries."

I say this from the experience I have had with the Treasury Department and from the experience I have had with other departments of the Government in my endeavors to get some fair consideration for the agricultural interests of the country. While during the past year millions of dollars have been loaned to commercial industries in this country to carry on business connected with the war, I ask you to show me where the Government has loaned any considerable amount of money to the agricultural industries of the country?

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield? The Government loaned $200,000,000 to them about three weeks ago.

Mr. NORTON. It is true that this Congress passed a bill providing an appropriation of $200,000,000 to be used by the Federal Farm Loan Board, to be loaned to the farmers during the next two years, on the very best security existent in this country. In doing that the Government did for the farmers of this country, for the agricultural interests of the country, for the production of food in this country, very little in comparison to what the Nation has done for the financial, commercial, manufacturing, and shipbuilding interests in the district and the section of the country represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who spoke so patronizingly concerning the farmers. One hundred million dollars or $200,000,000——

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORTON (continuing). Is simply a bagatelle to what has been spent and to what has been advanced by the Government to industries in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DOWELL. May I ask how much the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has secured from the Treasury of the United States in his district since he has been a Member of this body? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. NORTON. No. But I will say to the gentleman that $200,000,000 in comparison with the amount that has gone in the direction of Pennsylvania since the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who spoke so lightly about the needs of the farmer, has been in this House is a mere bagatelle.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think it was worth it all?

Mr. NORTON. I think the Hog Island incident that we have heard so much about during the past six weeks——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That will be your greatest shipyard.

Mr. NORTON (continuing). May be considered one of those beneficences of big business interests that have come from Pennsylvania to the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything on this bill, but in some parts of the country, especially in the Southwest, there are efforts being made to embarrass the Government by leading the farmers to believe that they are being discriminated against in war activities, which is not true.

I believe that I have shown in a practical way that I am a friend of the farmer, and do not have to introduce bills and offer amendments in order to display that friendship. I should not speak now except that I do not want the farmers who may read the RECORD of to-day's proceedings and the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] to be misled into believing that the class of paper covered by his amendment is not taken care of, when as a matter of fact agricultural notes by existing law have a better privilege than that proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Now, the gentleman says they are not doing it in Oklahoma. He is mistaken about that, and I think if he will investigate he will find the Federal reserve bank in Kansas City, the bank for the district in which Oklahoma is located, has accepted for rediscount all the agricultural notes presented to it from that State, and the long-term agricultural paper that has been accepted in that territory and is now held by the Federal reserve bank of Kansas City amounts to $2,337,000. And the reason they have not got more is because they have not asked for more. And if the farmer of Oklahoma is complaining that he has not been given the short-term credit, or even the long-term credit, up to the limit of the Federal reserve act his local banker is to blame, and he ought to go to him and insist that he take advantage of the law and procure for his farmers funds, which he may do, at 4½ and 5 per cent.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the gentleman understand that when a farmer uses his note for six months to purchase wheat and things of that kind that his paper is subject to rediscount by the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. WINGO. If properly secured and indorsed, it is. If you will read the law, you will find that agricultural paper was given a longer classification than any other class of paper.

Mr. MORGAN. I know the gentleman wants to be right, as I do. I have read these hearings on this bill, and they show, according to Mr. Warburg and Mr. McAdoo, that the Federal reserve banks confine themselves almost exclusively to what is called commercial paper, and they do not use anything else, and the note of the farmer is not commercial paper. The kind of commercial paper used by these reserve banks is the agricultural paper of the shipper. It is not that of the average farmer.

Mr. WINGO. I venture the assertion that not a note of an Oklahoma farmer has been rejected by the Federal reserve bank if it was in due form and properly indorsed and presented for rediscount. But, to the contrary, the bank at Kansas City now holds over $2,000,000 of agricultural notes which it has accepted and upon which Federal reserve notes were issued, or credit given, and at a rate of 5 per cent if due in more than 90 days and 4½ per cent if due in less time. And it does not charge any higher rate of interest upon the agricultural paper from Oklahoma under 90 days than it does on any other class of paper, such as the notes of the merchants and oil dealers. The increase of one-half of 1 per cent is controlled by the element of time, not the fact that it is agricultural paper. I repeat that if the farmers of Oklahoma have not had their notes rediscounted it is the fault of their local bankers, who can take their paper to the Federal bank at Kansas City and get the credit or Federal reserve notes they need.

The gentleman from Oklahoma overlooks the fact that the object of this bill is to take care of that class of securities that we excluded from the Federal Reserve System at the time it was created; that is, long-time investment paper. If the gentleman's amendment had been adopted it would not have added anything to the present law.

The bill as it is drawn now takes care of agricultural paper; and the Federal reserve banks are now under existing law taking care of all agricultural paper that is brought to them, and are taking care of it on the same terms that it gives commercial paper. As I said, the Kansas City bank now holds agricultural paper amounting to $2,337,000; another holds $4,124,000; and still another has $1,744,000; and another $1,217,000; and the reason why they do not hold more is because the farmers' notes in larger volume have not been presented to them. The Federal reserve bank can not go out and compel the farmers to take advantage of the provisions that have been made.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That shows that the farmers do not need the class of credit the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. WINGO. They do need the class of credit the gentleman suggests, but we have already on short-term notes met their needs to the same extent as other classes. I agree with the gentleman that we ought to go further in establishing a system of short-term rural credits, but that proposition is not involved in this bill. We are dealing here with another proposition entirely.

By the Federal reserve act we provided for a note issue, called Federal reserve notes, against commercial paper running not longer than 90 days, and against agricultural paper due within six months, and such notes are now being issued at the rate of 4½ per cent on both classes of paper running not longer than 90 days, and at the rate of 5 per cent on farm paper running longer than 90 days. Later on, by the farm loan or rural credit act we provided long-time loans for the farmer at a low rate of interest. But under neither the Federal reserve act nor the farm loan act is any provision made for long-time industrial securities, and the object of this bill is to make some provision for such of this class of securities that have been issued by concerns engaged in war activities, but can not get relief because the Government by sale of war bonds has preempted the source of supply which was sufficient during times of peace, and it is to be done by a separate agency to be called the War Finance Corporation. In other words, we propose by this act to give the same relief during the war to long-time paper of war industries that by permanent law we have already given during both peace and war to commercial and agricultural paper. That is all there is to the proposition, and the farmer is not discriminated against by it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: Page 5, strike out the word "bankers" wherever it appears in section 7.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, this brings to the attention of the committee the question of whether the word "banker" should be retained in this bill or not. In section 7 the words "any bank, banker, or trust company" appear six times. It seems to me that the word "banker" ought to be eliminated from this phraseology in the six places where it occurs. The word "banker" means an individual. It is included in the words "bank or trust company." I see no good reason why we should make a special privileged class and allow the banker that special privilege when we deny it to other persons.

Section 9 in this bill allows loans to be made to individuals of every class. Let the banker take his place in section 9. There ought to be no objection to that. I hope my amendment may be adopted.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The gentleman must have stepped out momentarily a while ago, as I discussed this whole question.

Mr. DILLON. I know; but nothing was done with it. We left it in.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I heard the last half of the explanation of the gentleman from North Carolina, which I could not quite comprehend as to why the word "banker" was left in there.

Mr. KITCHIN. It was done so that private bankers that are not chartered or incorporated, who loan money to these necessary war industries, should have the privilege of these advances. Why should they not?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why do not you say it, so that it does not require a technical interpretation? Why not make the language of the statute express clearly and precisely what you mean, using apt language?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because I understand that every man in the banking business, the whole banking world, understands that the word "banker" implies a private banker or a firm of private bankers. That is the distinction made in the Virginia laws and in the North Carolina laws, and Mr. Warburg says that is what is understood in the banking world. He explains that very thoroughly in his testimony. That is the reason why the word "bankers" is put in.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the language should be such as would convey the proper meaning to the average reader. If you go into any town in the country and ask what is this man's business they will say, "He is a banker." That is what they will say, "He is a banker."

Mr. KITCHIN. Take the Bethlehem Steel Works, and the question is asked, Who is Mr. Schwab? and the reply is that he is a steel manufacturer. Let me say to the gentleman that we are using the technical language, the intelligible language, the usual language that is used in all banking circles.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You say that a man is a merchant because he conducts a business of buying and selling goods. A man is a banker if he is president of a national bank—that is his business.

Mr. KITCHIN. He is in the banking business; he is an officer of the bank.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then why do not you use the language in full in your statute which you referred to a moment ago and say "a person conducting the business of a private banker"?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think that it would add to it at all. I think it is so well understood by all who would deal with the concern, all who would construe the language, that there is no use of adding to it. I see what the gentleman is trying to get at.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I think that the gentleman from Wisconsin is identifying the man in the banking business or corporation or firm engaged in a general banking business, while the gentleman from North Carolina refers to the man who would be a banker, although in a subordinate capacity; but the fact is he would not be loaning money.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from South Dakota wanted to strike out the word "bankers" because it would let in private bankers.

Mr. DILLON. Let me submit this proposition. Here is a banking institution which has a president, a vice president, and a cashier. Now, they are all bankers, and each one of these individuals could come in and get protection under this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. DILLON. Oh, yes; because they are bankers. The bank comes under the protection of the bill and the cashier can get protection and the vice president or the president can get protection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; the gentleman is in error.

Mr. DILLON. Is not the president of a bank a banker?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; he is an officer of the bank.

Mr. MADDEN. I think what is meant by a banker is an investment banker, a man who places bonds, buys and sells them, and deals in mortgages; he is a banker.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Investment bankers would be one class of bankers who would come within the classification of a banker.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the "postage-stamp" cost of application of getting a license, to which I referred in asking him a question, I want to read from page 77 of the hearings before the committee:

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Secretary, what expense would attach to a corporation or an individual seeking to put securities on the market for the licensing permit to offer such securities?

Secretary MCADOO. None whatever. It would involve the postage on their request or the payment of railroad fare to Washington to present their case, or, if they employed a lawyer, the payment of a fee to the lawyer to present the case for them. I think, however, that a lawyer would not be necessary.

So it will amount almost to an invitation. These hearings will be widely read. The cry will be, "On to Washington; on to Washington. Loans for everybody. Dig into the Treasury." Farmers will apply, regardless of their rights or what they think their rights are with the Federal reserve bank. Bring on your short-line railroads, bring on your old sawmills, your business propositions. Of course, they will not all get into the public chest, but they will try.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has recalled a very interesting piece of testimony. It is true that the Secretary did say that it would not be necessary for the applicant to employ a lawyer. Therefore, if the farmers in Oklahoma and North Dakota desired to apply, they could do it by means of a postal card.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and the cry goes merrily on, "Let Uncle Sam do it." Let Uncle Sam raise the money, lend it, give it away, run the railroads, the telephones, the telegraph, build houses, build towns, do the work, run the farms, conduct the markets, carry on a high-grade brokerage business, and win the war.

Mr. MORGAN. The farmers will not get very far?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is not likely they will get very far.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the other hand, it will let the farmer in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, there is likely to be a grand rush, anyway. Another governmental corporation—another great bureau. Once started, how can it stop? I see by the Shipping Board News, the official newspaper of the Shipping Board Corporation, that that corporation is talking of commandeering four or five banking buildings in the city for additional space in which to do business. I see also that Congress is scolded for not giving the board a fine building of its own. And I saw in both of yesterday's local afternoon papers an inspired dig at Congress, criticizing this body because it is not more active in getting out the District housing bill. The attitude of the men who inspired these particular articles seems to be that the biggest war measure is the housing in the city of Washington.

There has come to Washington an army of publicity agents to represent the new activities of the Government. Each publicity expert contends that the particular activity which he represents is the only real governmental activity; that the agency for which he boosts is the one which will win the war. Confidentially, he will tell you that the other activities do not amount to much; that investigation is needed; that money is squandered, and so on. Why, it seems that official press agency publicity is running riot. And the great bureaus and governmental corporations encourage it. Give them an inch and they take an ell, war or no war. Their free Government newspapers and their advance notices swamp the mails. They will not stop. They have got the money and the power.

One great trouble with all these sort of bills is that Congress does not seem to retain enough control. A great bureau is established and started, and away it goes. The Food Administration went far. The Fuel Administration went further. And this money administration will go a little further and last longer than any other. No one can see its end. Few seem to care to tie any sort of string to this $500,000,000 in cash or to look into the future concerning a couple of billion dollars worth of a new kind of "near" Government bonds.

The bill is still unamended. But section 9 and other sections are still to be considered. I am glad the consideration goes over to another day.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HUMPHREYS). The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to make advances from time to time, upon such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding one year, to any savings bank, banking institution or trust company, which receives savings deposits, or to any building and loan association, on the promissory note or notes of the borrowing institution, whenever the corporation shall deem such advances to be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war or important in the public interest: Provided, That such note or notes shall be secured by the pledge of securities of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, the market value of which, at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation) shall be equal in amount to at least 133 per cent of the amount of such advance: And provided further, That the rate of interest charged on any such advance shall not be less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the time of such advance at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrowing institution is located. The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should like to say that if we can finish section 8 by 5.30 we will rise and go on to section 9 to-morrow. I simply want to make that statement, so that we will not have a prolonged debate and go into other matters, but so that we can rise at 5.30.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURROUGHS: Page 8, line 10, after the word "advance," insert a comma and after the comma insert the following words: "except in the case of a mutual savings bank."

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will take only a minute to explain what I have in mind by this amendment. I tried to cover it in my remarks this morning. Frankly, the effect of it will be to eliminate the mutual savings banks; I mean those savings banks that do not have any capital stock and whose whole profits go to the small depositors; it will exempt them from the terms of this proviso, so that the restrictive interest rate, the discriminatory interest rate of 1 per cent in addition to that imposed by the Federal Reserve Bank in that district, shall not apply in the case of a mutual savings bank. I see no reason why it should apply to them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. With pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state the reason why it should not apply?

Mr. BURROUGHS. My reason for offering this amendment, and the reason why this proviso should not apply to the mutual savings bank——

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I am interested in.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Is because the mutual savings bank is not a profit-making proposition to any stockholder. It has no capital stock whatever.

Mr. GLASS. Is it not a profit-making institution to its depositors?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not that merely a difference in terms?

Mr. BURROUGHS. It seems to me that the distinction is very clear and that we ought not to discriminate here in any way against these mutual savings banks.

Mr. GLASS. As I understand it, we are not discriminating against them, but what the gentleman is trying to do is to make of them a privileged class.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I understand we have just adopted a section which is for the benefit of all bankers, banks, and banking institutions, which does not contain this discriminating interest rate. I find nothing in that section which relates to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But that section relates to banks which have loaned money to war concerns.

Mr. BURROUGHS. This whole thing is in the interest of the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; this applies only to matters of public interest.

Mr. BURROUGHS. What can be more a matter of national interest than the maintaining of deposits in the great savings banks of this country?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will it not give the mutual savings banks an advantage over the other banks, if they are excepted from this proviso?

Mr. BURROUGHS. No; it will not give them any advantage so far as I can see, any more than they should have. I think a mutual savings bank, not being engaged in business for profit for any stockholder, should not be discriminated against.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. These mutual savings banks can not make loans to any corporation that is engaged in the manufacture of munitions. They are restricted in their loans, and therefore why should they get the benefit of this provision?

Mr. BURROUGHS. The mutual savings banks can make loans now, can they not, if they see fit to do so?

Mr. HICKS. They can not make outside commercial loans in the sense that these other banks can.

Mr. BURROUGHS. True enough; but I can not see why you should put a discriminating interest rate on the savings banks. I would strike it out as against all savings banks. Why should you put a discriminating rate of interest against savings banks, when you have not imposed such a rate on any of the other banks in the preceding section? You certainly seem to me to have made a discrimination here against the savings banks.

Mr. MADDEN. I will ask the gentleman to show where?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I say you have not put the provision in the preceding section, while you have put it in the section relating to the savings banks.

Mr. MADDEN. The conditions under which the banks in the preceding sections are treated are totally different from the conditions under which these banks are treated.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the first banking class provided for in section 7 is not to help the banks, but is to help the war industries. The War Finance Corporation gets a double security. It gets not only the war-industry notes as a security, but also the notes of the bank that loans the money to the war industry. The corporation makes no extra charge in such cases, because the advance is not made for the interest of the banks, but the corporation gets the bank's note and as additional security the note of the war industry and the assets behind the loan. Therefore we do not charge that bank anything additional, for the reason that if we charged that bank 1 per cent more than the prevailing rate, that bank would have to charge the war industry that we propose to help in that section 1 per cent more, and therefore it would not help the war industry, because it would not pay it. We provided the 1 per cent additional on savings banks for the reason that the money loaned to the savings bank is going to be loaned direct by this corporation and for the interest of the savings bank. We do not require the savings bank, before it can get any of this money, to loan the money to a war industry, but we simply require that the savings bank shall be important to the national interests, and it is to protect the savings bank, and it is doing it to protect its life for its interest. Therefore we put the savings bank upon the same terms as we do any other direct loan by the corporation.

If the corporation, under section 9, made a direct loan to the du Ponts or to the Bethlehem, it would charge the du Ponts and the Bethlehem that 1 per cent extra, just exactly as it would charge the savings bank. Why? Because nothing is added to the security of the du Pont or the Bethlehem for this direct loan, but if it makes the du Pont go through the bank channels, then it would have the security of the bank added to that of the du Pont Co., and it would not charge the 1 per cent extra.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROUGHS. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina I wish to quote from the testimony of Mr. Warburg before the House committee. It is found on pages 36 and 37 of the hearings. Mr. Warburg was questioned about this matter by Mr. FORDNEY, of the committee:

Mr. FORDNEY. What is the maximum rate of interest charged now by the Federal reserve banks for commercial loans? I ought to know, but I am not positive that I do know.

Mr. WARBURG. Five and a half per cent is the highest, and that is for six months.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then this law provides not to exceed 1 per cent above that amount?

Mr. WARBURG. I think that limit probably would drop out if you removed the 90-day limit.

You must remember that this bill as it was originally drawn provided that these loans to savings banks should not exceed 90 days. Now the bill is changed, and it is not limited to 90-day notes, but these loans may be made for the limit of a year, so that Mr. Warburg says:

I think that limit—

Meaning the 1 per cent limit of interest to which I have referred—

I think that limit probably would drop out if you would remove the 90-day limit, because that was only to serve as an index for 90-day loans. If you decide to make these savings banks loans up to one year, I think then you want to strike out the limit entirely and leave it to the board of directors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I would ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Warburg says further:

If you decide to make these savings-banks loans up to one year, I think then you want to strike out the limit entirely and leave it to the board of directors; and I think it is very important that the board of directors should have a free hand in fixing those rates of interest, because you can not put down any rule which would cover a one-year loan and a five-year loan at the same time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I will.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would not the gentleman's amendment at once practically destroy the stock savings banks? Is not the discrimination against them? If the mutual savings bank has four times more deposits than the stock savings bank and can get its money from this corporation at 1 per cent less rate of interest than the stock savings bank, would it not be very unfair and unjust and discriminatory?

Mr. BURROUGHS. It does not seem so to me; if I may be permitted to put my judgment against that of the distinguished chairman of the committee. But even if it is, it seems to me to be a justifiable discrimination because of the clear distinction between the mutual savings bank, which is in no sense engaged in a profit-making business for any stockholders, but whose whole profit goes to the benefit of its large number of small depositors who make up the working classes of the community, and the stock bank, which is engaged in the profit-making business and whose whole profits go to the benefit of its stockholders. I am entirely willing and I understand the mutual savings banks are entirely willing to trust their case to the directors of this corporation as to the rate of interest they shall pay. That is what my amendment contemplates. It would leave the fixing of the rate of interest entirely in the hands of the directors of this corporation. These directors might see fit to make the rate as great as the minimum rate prescribed by the bill. Why can you not trust them to exercise this power wisely? Why attempt to fix by law a minimum rate of interest that the mutual savings banks of this country must pay in order to protect themselves against the withdrawal of their deposits in this war emergency? Especially why do you do this when you have not done it in the case of advances to be made to banks, bankers, and trust companies under the preceding section of this bill? I think the savings bank, which is to a greater extent than any other bank we have the people's bank, should be entitled at least to as fair treatment as you accord to other banking institutions of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, the distinction presented here of a bank that is not a money-making institution for its stockholders but is a money-making institution for its depositors and a bank that makes money for its stockholders and not its depositors is a distinction practically without a difference in the final analysis. No more dangerous or unreasonable proposition has been presented to this House than that presented by the gentleman from New Hampshire. He is proposing that banking institutions which have never borne one particle of the burden of the Federal Reserve System shall, so to speak, be made "God's chosen people," a privileged class unto itself, and granted loans at 1 per cent interest lower than that accorded banks which have borne the burden of the Federal Reserve System from the beginning. I think it is a misfortune—it is distressing—that it was found necessary at all to put this provision in the bill. I concede that perhaps it was essential to do so; but, as I understand it, it was put there to serve a more or less psychological purpose—to use a term that is somewhat threadbare—to prevent possible embarrassment to savings banks. There is some apprehension that persons desiring to invest in liberty-loan bonds bearing an inviting interest rate, as well as persons desiring, from purely patriotic promptings, to aid the war by investing in Government securities, might withdraw their deposits from the mutual savings banks. And in order to give assurance and stability to these banks this provision is put in, according them, upon the same terms that prevail as to all other banks, the right to obtain loans with which to replenish their vaults when deposits are withdrawn. The investment securities of mutual savings banks are not eligible to rediscount operations in the Federal Reserve System. This bill gives them a status. But to put them on a privileged basis, giving them rediscount at a less rate than is given commercial banks of the Federal Reserve System using the same class of securities, would be to clutter up the Federal reserve banks with long-time maturities. That would simply prove disastrous.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Is it the gentleman's idea that this legislation is for the purpose of relieving burdens that now rest upon the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. GLASS. I do not exactly comprehend the gentleman's question. The purpose of the proposed legislation is not simply to relieve burdens of the Federal Reserve System; that system can carry its own burdens easily. The purpose of this bill is to finance this war in general and in particular to finance those banking institutions that have loaned or shall loan money to concerns and corporations that are engaged in producing supplies whereby the war may successfully be conducted. Another purpose of the measure is to help the refunding operations of great corporations, the failure of which might embarrass the whole financial situation of the country.

But surely the bill is not designed to make a favored class of banking institutions that have not borne any of the burdens of the Federal Reserve System or to discriminate against banks that are taxed to maintain the system.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think that the only reason this section should be in the bill is that it would prevent a calamity that might come from the collapse of the saving institutions?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that is the only reason it is in this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. And not for the benefit of the war industries or the prosecution of the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And this paragraph was put in here to meet just such an emergency as might arise in case of a raid on the savings funds.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this amendment is absolutely essential. In the first place, it is wrong to say that the mutual savings banks have no part in carrying the burden of this war. If you will look over the statistics you will find that they are the only banks that have lost in deposits during the sale of United States bonds. These bonds have been sold so extensively to people of small means that the money has been withdrawn from the savings banks of the country.

Now, with this provision in the bill the savings banks can not take advantage of it, and you might as well leave it out. The savings banks deal only in money at low rates. They can not talk of money at above 4 per cent. To-day in the city of New York, for instance, the Federal reserve banks are rediscounting paper at 4½ per cent. Add 1 per cent to that and you have 5½ per cent—a prohibitive rate. The savings banks can not pay it, for on the money that is deposited with them in the city of New York they pay 4 per cent. Over the entire country they are now paying 4 per cent, and this interest goes entirely to the poor man, for in the State of New York and in many of the New England States they are limited to the payment on deposits not to exceed $3,000. It is just the poor man's bank. The average deposits in the State of New York are $576.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROWE. The money is being taken very largely out of the savings banks to pay for the small bonds, and the savings banks are the very institutions that are going to suffer. All the State and national banks have to-day more money on deposit than they had when this Government began to sell Liberty bonds. It is time we were thinking of the common people and the people of small properties, to whom the savings banks have opened their doors. These savings banks have sold and are selling the bonds of the Government over their counters, knowing that the people were going to take deposits out of their banks to pay for them.

Mr. GLASS. Have not all banks done that?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. I can not yield.

Now, this amendment does not change the law in reference to banking. For all commercial banks this board of directors is to fix the rate of interest. Why not fix it for the savings banks also?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee the reason for the concluding sentence of this section:

The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time.

Does that mean in addition to the security the market value of which shall amount to at least 133 per cent they can come in the next day and say, "You must put up security to raise that to 175 per cent"?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, they will have that power, just like every bank does, and to have every loan it makes secured by collateral. I think that I have borrowed about as much money on little notes as anybody, and I do not think that I ever put up one that did not have that provision in it; and this is to give the corporation power to protect itself. If my security had depreciated, say, from 133 per cent down to 75 per cent, I would have to put up additional security.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that they should have that power, but here these directors would make a loan on being satisfied that the securities pledged were 133 per cent of the amount, and the next day, without any change, they might come in and require additional security.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that under that language they could do it, just like the banks can do it under the notes they take. Of course, this corporation would not do it, because the very object and purpose of the bill is to loan money to these concerns that are contributing to the war.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I agree that the directors ought to have that power in the case of depreciation in the value of the securities; but by this very broad language here it is not limited to such instances as that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it is an additional safeguard. I am sure they will never use the power in the way the gentleman thinks.

Mr. WALSH. I simply wanted to get the idea of the committee. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. On page 7, section 8, line 22, after the word "company," insert "in the United States"; and in line 23, page 7, after the word "association," insert "in the United States." Then that harmonizes with the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 22, after the word "company," insert the words "in the United States"; and in line 23, after the word "association," insert the words "in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is there any other amendment to be offered to section 8? If not, we will read section 9, and then I will move to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized, in exceptional cases, to make advances directly to any person, firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business in the United States whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war (but only for the purpose of conducting such business in the United States and only when such person, firm, corporation, or association is unable to obtain funds through banking channels or from the general public), for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation. In no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this section exceed at any one time an amount equal to 16⅔ per cent of the sum of (1) the paid-in capital stock of the corporation at such time plus (2) the aggregate amount of bonds of the corporation authorized to be outstanding at such time. Every such advance shall be secured by adequate security of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of a market value at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors), equal to at least 133 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation. The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time. The rate of interest charged on any such advance shall not be less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the time of such advance at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrower is located.

The corporation shall file quarterly reports with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, giving the name and place of business of each person, firm, corporation, or association receiving advances under this section, the amount advanced, the terms, and the security accepted therefor.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The Chairman. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the section.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10608) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. On this bill?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. On the pending bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same privilege.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who participated in the debate on this bill, either in the general debate or under the five-minute rule, be given the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD within five days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a few days' leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. FORDNEY, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. FORDNEY, indefinitely, on account of illness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CAPSTICK.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to make an announcement before he forgets it. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] can not go on the Capstick funeral party on account of public business, and the Chair appoints Mr. SWIFT, of New York, in his place.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying report (No. 393), was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. On what?

Mr. CRAMTON. On the censorship rule with reference to casualty lists—a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the censorship rule with reference to the casualty list. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, is it your remarks, or some newspaper, or what?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is some remarks that I hope to incorporate. It will all be a very brief statement. I will incorporate some data that I could not prepare otherwise.

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish the gentleman would withhold that to-night and ask for it some other time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina object?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is a very brief statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that the gentleman withdraw his request now and make the request later.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think I will let the gentleman object, if he prefers to. It is a very brief statement, however.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina objects.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday to-morrow be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Is it the purpose to go on with this bill to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and I want to say that if Members will attend pretty well to-morrow we can finish this bill, and on Thursday we will be able to take up the Madden bill, the postal employees' bill, under the rule, and we hope to get through with that on Thursday. I am sure that absent Members on both sides have been notified that that bill will probably come up on Thursday. I hope the debate under the five-minute rule to-morrow will be confined to the amendments offered, so we can get along without so much outside debate.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, although I shall not object eventually. Quite a number of the Members of the House will be absent to-morrow on official business, and I think most of them would like to have the privilege of voting on this bill, especially if there is to be a record vote.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair was going to guess about it, he would guess that they will have that chance.

Mr. KITCHIN. There will be no trouble about the statement being made in the RECORD that all those who are in favor of the bill would vote for it if they were present.

Mr. BROWNING. The gentleman knows as well as I do that there are some 16 Members of the House who are going to be absent to-morrow in attendance on the funeral of our late colleague, Mr. CAPSTICK, and if the vote were to be taken on Thursday we would all be back and have the opportunity to be recorded on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent to do away with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BOHEMIAN NATIONAL ALLIANCE.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a general resolution of the Bohemian National Alliance, which contains a great deal of valuable information that I know the Members of the House will be pleased to have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain data which he mentions. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 20, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10590) to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, conferring jurisdiction upon district courts to partition lands belonging to full-blood heirs of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 392), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Also, petition of Gertrude Blakesley, Lillian S. Fisher, Alice W. Andrews, Laura S. Brannan, Gertrude R. Scholasser, Grace O. Krout, Ida A. Gilland, Mrs. E. H. Mohrbacher, A. F. Culbertson, Gretchen Brecnermann-Smith, and 41 others, all citizens of the State of Colorado, praying for immediate war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McCLINTIC: Petition of sundry citizens of Jackson County and Custer, Okla., asking relief for farmers in manufactured articles they must buy; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petition of sundry citizens of Olustee, Okla., favoring closing all breweries during the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MADDEN: Petition of Lithuanians of the State of Illinois, relative to independence for Lithuania; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Resolution of the army and navy committee of the city of Newport, R. I., in re extension of the naval training station; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RAINEY: Petition of E. F. Crane and other citizens of Mount Sterling, Ill., favoring universal military training; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: Petition of Morgan County Federation of Farm Women's Clubs, Fort Morgan, Colo., against any increase in second-class postage; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Walter M. Long, Boulder, Colo., relative to patent for 10 claims, Sugar Loaf mining district, Boulder County, Colo.; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we worship Thee and hold in reverence and godly fear Thy holy name. We pray Thee to help us to see it through in these tragic times, that we may understand that God is working through men against blind force and hate and rage for the establishment of order and justice and peace in this world. Give us the inspiration of this noble and divine enterprise in all that we do in this Chamber. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. VARDAMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SEACOAST FORTIFICATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 203).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, stating that upon information the appropriation of $1,000,000 for contingent expenses incident to the construction of seacoast fortifications and other accessories carried in the law of June 15, 1917, does not apply to the insular possessions, the Panama Canal, or Porto Rico, and recommending that a proviso authorizing the extension of this appropriation be placed in the fortifications bill for 1919, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) authorizing the erection of a memorial in Washington to the memory and in honor of the members of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9314) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLOOD, Mr. LINTHICUM, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin managers at the conference on the part of the House.

MEMORIAL TO CIVIL WAR NURSES.

Mr. WEEKS. Is it in order at this time to take up the joint resolution just received from the House of Representatives?

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask unanimous consent that immediate consideration be given to the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution, and it will be read at length.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) authorizing the erection of a memorial in Washington to the memory and in honor of the members of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission to the Ladies' Auxiliary, Ancient Order of Hibernians in America, for the erection on public grounds of the United States of America in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a memorial to the members of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if a similar joint resolution has been referred to the committee of the Senate and favorably passed upon by that committee?

Mr. WEEKS. It has been referred to the Library Committee of the Senate and has been approved by that committee. Moreover, a similar joint resolution passed the Senate in the last Congress. The purpose is one which must appeal to every man who admires disinterested devotion to duty. No men or women have performed a finer service than that done by the sisters whose memory will be perpetuated by this memorial.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bridgeport, of the Business Woman's Association, of Bridgeport, and of the Equal Franchise League, of Hamden, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch, Connecticut State Association of Letter Carriers, of South Norwalk, Conn., praying for an increase in the salaries of letter carriers, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Central Medical Society, of Middletown, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the National Metal Trades Association, of New Haven, Conn., and a petition of the Employers' Association, of Hartford, Conn., praying for an extension of time in which to pay excess-profits taxes and income taxes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented resolutions adopted by the Caldwell County Council of Defense of Texas, favoring the manufacturing of ammunition for war purposes only, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Home Guard, of Lockhart, Tex., relative to strikes and threats of strikes as a menace in the successful prosecution of the war, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Texas State Senate, favoring the enactment of legislation to substitute Federal for local credit in financing reclamation districts, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the Agricultural Society of North Middlesex, Mass., remonstrating against war profiteering and favoring the establishment of minimum prices on all commodities, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Albany, Oreg., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Manufacturers and Employers' Association, of San Diego, Cal., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. OWEN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Texanna, Tulsa, Britton, and Choctaw, all in the State of Oklahoma, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide punishment for persons or organizations responsible for pro-German activities or for interference with the Government in the prosecution of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALDER. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a short letter from J. Henry Smythe, jr., relative to advertising the third liberty loan.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

209 WEST THIRTY-EIGHTH STREET,
New York, March 14, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CALDER: To win the war cooperation is necessary. Why not combine in part the advertising of liberty loan, war savings stamps, and United States Food Administration?

Third liberty loan posters will soon be blazoning their command of "Buy United States Government bonds." Campaign speakers will also spread their investment messages.

Bonds are not well sold unless they are later kept out of the market. Liberty loan posters were ordered torn down after the first and second drives. Why not let the 1918 issues remain where possible and later paste under the lithographed pictures: "Own and keep some liberty bonds"? To this slogan could wisely be added "And war savings stamps," or "And don't waste food."

If thrift and savings stamps publicity were featured even more just following the flotation of each liberty loan all patriotic propaganda would be strengthened. In England simultaneous soliciting has proved successful, so why not in our country? Thrift would be better inculcated.

Each Government publicity department has done excellent work, but "in union there is strength."

Yours, for victory, J. HENRY SMYTHE, Jr.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4143) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization; to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 4144) granting an honorable discharge to R. Derby Holmes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California:

A bill (S. 4145) granting a pension to Abbie Pike; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota:

A bill (S. 4146) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine and report upon the interest, title, ownership, and right of possession of the Yankton Tribe of Indians to the Red Pipestone Quarries, South Dakota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 4147) granting an increase of pension to Jeanette Morrison (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 4148) for the relief of Catherine Grace; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4149) granting a pension to Flora A. Nelson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 4150) granting an increase of pension to George W. Goodman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4151) to provide for a determination of heirship in cases of deceased members of the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, conferring jurisdiction upon district courts to partition lands belonging to full-blood heirs of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9314) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. JONES of Washington conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 19th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 1854) to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9054, the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Martin	Swanson
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kellogg	New	Tillman
Curtis	King	Page	Townsend
Fall	Kirby	Shafroth	Trammell
Hale	Lodge	Sheppard	Vardaman
Hardwick	McCumber	Sherman	Wadsworth
Henderson	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Watson
Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Smoot	Weeks

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent in connection with the duties of the Judiciary Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. THOMPSON and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on official business, and I also make the same announcement in reference to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD].

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instruction of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. FRANCE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], who is attending the funeral of the late Representative CAPSTICK.

Mr. OWEN, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. HOLLIS, and Mr. WARREN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. KENDRICK] on public business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. REED, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. NELSON, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. BORAH, Mr. CUMMINS, and Mr. STERLING entered the Chamber, and

Mr. OVERMAN said: I wish to state that the Committee on the Judiciary has been engaged on a very important matter and I ask that the members be recorded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, we have been discussing for two or three days, under the motion to suspend the rules, our reasons for supporting or opposing the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate, except to explain why I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. President, I should like to have order for a moment. I am not making this explanation simply for my constituents, as I am not a candidate for reelection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. FALL. We have heard a great deal about the law of supply and demand, Mr. President, as being applicable in the minds of the speakers to the question before the Senate at this time. I do not agree with some of the Senators that the prior action of the Congress of the United States in placing a minimum price upon wheat for this year was not technically legislative interference with the ordinary or natural law of supply and demand. I think that it was intended to stimulate the supply of wheat, and to that extent it was an interference, and an intentional interference with the law.

I think, further, that vesting the power in the Food Administration to fix the maximum price or to purchase for the Government and to restrict the consumption of flour—the product of wheat—was an interference with the law of supply and demand.

The intention, first, was to stimulate the supply by guaranteeing the farmers a minimum price. There was no attempt to fix the price by the Congress, but there was a legislative declaration that the farmers should receive at least $2 per bushel for their wheat. The operation, Mr. President, under the law vesting that power in the Food Administration has been this: The price at which the Government of the United States would purchase wheat and the price at which it should be sold was fixed at $2.20 per bushel. The Food Administration then notified the millers of the United States that they should only purchase and consume in their mills a certain amount of wheat. Of course that action restricted the domestic demand for flour, the product of wheat.

So there has been by this legislation, first, the attempt to stimulate the supply, to increase the amount of wheat produced, and, second, the administrative or executive action intended to decrease and resulting in decreasing the domestic demand for wheat or for flour. Under the rule of the Food Administration Department allotments were made for certain cities of the amount of wheat which might be ground there. In turn, allotments were made to different mills in those cities, and they were not allowed to go out into the market and purchase wheat in competition with others; they could only purchase their allotted amount. That action necessarily not only tended to result but resulted in the restriction of the home demand for wheat.

Then, again, the people of the United States, as patriots, have been urged to consume less wheat and less flour and more of the substitutes for wheat and flour. Corn, barley, oats, and other cereals were left by the legislature, and have been left by the Food Administration, to be sold and produced, under the ordinary law of supply and demand, without legislative or executive or administrative action either tending to or intended to increase the supply or to restrict the domestic consumption, but the action with reference to wheat and the use of wheat substitutes has necessarily tended to increase the demand for wheat substitutes themselves, and particularly for corn and corn products—corn meal, and so forth.

So we have to-day the price of wheat fixed absolutely by law, and by administrative acts following it, at $2.20 a bushel; we have the price of corn and corn meal and other corn products subject simply to the demand which the action with reference to wheat has very greatly increased. The consequence is that, while the result with reference to wheat has given to our allies in France and in England and the other countries to which we are shipping wheat, wheat at a less price than they would have paid and did pay just before this legislative demand—for they were then paying $3.20 per bushel for wheat instead of as now, $2.20—while it has tended to result in giving them their foodstuffs very much more cheaply, its natural result has been to increase the price of those substitutes which the people of the United States are compelled to consume.

In my State of New Mexico, for instance, I am sorry to say that, not being a great agricultural State, we have not been able to produce as much of the cereals—corn and wheat—as we consume; in fact, we have been producing only about 40 per cent of the amount which we consume. Our specialty is meat. We produce much more meat in the shape of beef and mutton than we consume; and, with that, we purchase the other 60 per cent of the wheat, corn, and so forth, which we consume. So that while we are self-supporting we are not self-supporting in the matter of production of the necessary wheat and corn for our own consumption in our population.

To-day we find the people of New Mexico paying from $6 to $6.50 for 100 pounds of flour, and we find them compelled for every 25 pounds of flour which they purchase to purchase 25 pounds of corn meal or other wheat substitute, and the corn meal is sold to them at $7.50 per 100 pounds. The allies—French, English, and others—are obtaining the benefit of what is practically a maximum fixed price for wheat, and the people of the United States are paying the difference in their maximum cost of living upon wheat substitutes. I think that the facts which I have related with reference to conditions in New Mexico are true over the entire United States.

In my judgment, the fixing of the price of wheat by the Food Administration was an error. I think that if wheat had been left as corn was left, the price possibly of the two—wheat and corn—would have been more nearly equalized. I think that the allies would cheerfully pay almost any price, as they were paying before the action of the Food Administration, to secure the necessary wheat.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the people of the United States are paying for the wheat consumed by their allies, and are taxing themselves for it. We are loaning to France, England, and the other countries consuming our wheat by taxing the people of the United States and issuing bonds to obtain the funds with which they pay for the wheat; and I am frank to say, sir, that, in my judgment, it makes but little difference to those people what they pay, provided they get the supply.

But the cost of farm machinery has gone up; the cost of everything which the farmer is using has gone up, not out of proportion to the ordinary cost at all, not through the selfish desire of the manufacturers of implements or others to profiteer—because, in my judgment, there has been no profiteering—but because the cost of their material and particularly the cost of their labor has gone up. Farm labor, which we could formerly secure at $30 per month and board, is now costing $90 per month and board the year around. Harvest labor last year cost 40 cents an hour in many of our wheat fields. The cost of labor in all factories and in every line of business in the United States has gone up, and the cost of material has increased. So the farmer is paying more for his machinery; he is paying more for his labor; and it is costing him more to produce his crops.

The average wheat crop of the United States is only about 12 bushels to the acre. Where the yield exceeds 12 bushels and runs to the maximum of, say, 30 bushels in localities, the price of $2 per bushel may be remunerative to the farmer in those particular localities; but where it runs down, as it does in various sections of this country, to 7 bushels or to 8 or 10 bushels per acre, the price is not remunerative, and the consequence is that the farmer will not plant the wheat; so that the very object of the legislation which we have enacted, as I understand it and as I construed it when I voted for it, namely, to stimulate production, has not been obtained because of the administrative or executive action, not in simply guaranteeing a minimum price and allowing the law of demand to operate to increase the price above the minimum, but by fixing a price beyond which the law of demand should not operate at all.

It has been suggested during the course of this debate that the proper method would be to fix the price of corn, rye, oats, and barley so that the price of wheat and the price of the other cereals might not be so far apart but might be equalized. The only possible method by which that result could be achieved would be by legislation to fix a maximum price for corn, barley, oats, and rye and leave the price of wheat as it is now. You can not bring down corn by fixing a minimum price for corn. You have brought down wheat not by legislative action fixing the price of wheat—you only guaranteed a minimum price and left the maximum to operate under the law of demand—but by the action of the Food Administration—conscientiously taken, undoubtedly—both to conserve the supply of wheat and to supply our allies at a reasonable price, we have, as I have said, curtailed the demand for the one here. Now, how do you propose to curtail the demand for the others, or do you propose to do it?

We must have some substitute. If we are not to eat wheat, then we will eat corn, and we are eating it. The Congress has and the Food Administration by its action has created an enormous legislative demand for corn.

We have interfered with the law of supply and demand by our action in creating an excessive demand, I might say, for corn or for wheat substitutes, because we have taken from the domestic market the wheat which we are sending abroad.

I am inclined to justify the action of the Food Administration in calling upon the people of the United States to use wheat substitutes and in sending our wheat and our flour abroad, because we can here in our homes use corn meal and other wheat substitutes; but in the trenches the soldiers must have a bread prepared possibly days beforehand and which will keep for weeks. Corn bread will not keep for weeks. If we were fighting a civil war, as was suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a few days ago, or fighting entirely within our own country, our soldiers, in easy access to the corn fields, as were the soldiers of the South, could live and fight upon corn bread; but our soldiers in the trenches can not do so. We must supply them with a bread which will keep for days or for weeks if they are cut off by the enemy's barrage and are not in access to their supplies behind the trenches; and even when the access to such supplies is open the bread must be prepared beforehand. So corn bread can not possibly be supplied to the troops in the trenches.

Of course we all know that the people of Europe have not been accustomed to eating corn bread. We know further that we in the United States depend very largely upon our kitchens in our homes, while the people of Europe depend upon the bakeries, and the bakers can not provide corn bread for consumption beyond 24 hours.

For these reasons it has undoubtedly been proper that the effort should be made to send every possible pound of flour and other wheat products abroad. I think the error that has been committed—and I do think it was an error—was in undertaking to fix the price of wheat for the benefit of the allies and then compelling the people of the United States to subsist upon substitutes for which they must pay more than double the amount which they have been accustomed to pay. Wheat in New Mexico, based upon a $2.20 price for No. 1 in Chicago, brings $1.65, or 2.08 cents per pound, while corn in New Mexico brings 5 cents a pound. Those are the conditions; and to have the farmers grow wheat you must allow them either to make a profit out of wheat or you must allow them to make a profit out of corn. To-day they are not making a profit out of wheat, and the allies are benefited; but they are making a profit out of corn, and the farmers are benefited. Now, if you undertake to fix the price of corn, you will lose both the supply of wheat and the supply of corn; the farmer will simply retire to the boundaries of his own farm and raise enough to feed himself and his family. He is just as patriotic as any man engaged in any other enterprise, but with him, as with any officeholder or any Senator, the comfort of his own family is his first consideration. Charity begins at home. When it is necessary that his family should subsist, as it is, and when he can raise upon his farm the products upon which they can subsist, he will raise them; but he will not raise at a loss, at the cost of the subsistence of his own family, products to go to the allies or products to go to the people of the United States. In other words, it is not fair to call upon the farmer of the United States to run the only charitable institution which we inaugurate, aside from the Red Cross or some similar benevolent society; but you must let the farmer make a profit or you will not have your supply.

I shall vote to increase the minimum price of wheat to $2.50, because I believe that it is justice to the farmer, because I believe that it may have a tendency to reduce the price of corn or of wheat substitutes, and because I believe that it may operate, as the original legislation was intended to operate, to increase the supply by legislative demand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I would not inject observations of my own into this discussion were I not convinced that this is perhaps one of the most important proposals that has reached the Congress during this session.

Mr. President, I think we are in for a long, hard, grueling contest. I have no doubt of its outcome, but I feel convinced that before it is over this country will be called upon to put forth every ounce of its energy, a great portion of its man power, and all its resources. Convinced as I am to this effect, the thing that causes me concern at this particular stage of the proceedings is whether or not we are properly conserving our resources and marshaling them in such a way as to make sure the victory for which all of us hope.

The situation which confronts the world and the situation which confronts our allies to-day is serious. We might just as well understand it. There is a distinct shortage of food in England, in France, and in Italy. The public statement of the French high commissioner day before yesterday is very frank in that declaration so far as France is concerned, and we have read in the press dispatches recently of the institution in England of a rationing system for the entire population. We all know that one of the greatest difficulties in feeding those countries is the lack of transportation. We hope to overcome that lack by building a tremendous fleet of merchant ships and at the same time improving our methods of combating the submarine; but it will do no particular good to build a great fleet of merchant vessels or to wipe out the submarine if the resources of the United States, particularly wheat, are not conserved, and, if possible, increased.

Most of the addresses that have been made thus far upon this amendment have been made by Senators from the so-called wheat States. While I represent in part a State which is one of the leading agricultural States of the Union, nevertheless I can not assert that it is a great wheat State. What I shall say this morning will be based upon what I hope is a national view rather than a provincial view.

We are discussing now whether we are to produce enough wheat during the coming year and, inferentially, whether we shall continue to produce enough wheat in the years to come. Some rosy statements were made upon the floor of the Senate last year and upon the public platforms of the country about what could be done to reduce the cost of living and at the same time increase production. A great many people—I think, perhaps, the majority of our people—were led to believe that we could suspend the law of supply and demand or repeal economic laws for the time being because a state of war existed and because the legislative power or the executive power so decreed. Much was said about profiteering and much about gamblers and speculators. In fact, those terms were the most frequently used upon the floor of the Senate last August. Even the President of the United States, in a message which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] read in part day before yesterday, expressed his opinion that the law of supply and demand had been displaced by unrestrained selfishness and was no longer in operation.

With due respect to that high Executive, I beg leave to differ from him and from all those who contend that the law of supply and demand has been suspended or can be suspended. We have tried it, and I venture the assertion that the facts to-day show that we have failed. We have accomplished certain things, but in accomplishing those certain things we have brought about other and unexpected things, and those other and unexpected conditions are the very conditions that, I may say, are bedeviling public psychology to-day. We can take a sensitive rubber ball and press our thumb into it and declare to the expectant onlooker that we have reduced the cubic contents of the rubber ball, but it is not so. The ball has bulged out in some other direction. We can enact a law of Congress fixing a price, or one of our commissions can issue a decree fixing a price upon a certain article, but that article is only one element of the entire problem; when we press down upon that article, as the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has indicated, we make some other article or articles bulge up. That is what has occurred with the grains produced in the United States.

This matter of control of supply and control of demand is a pretty delicate problem, and we make it all the more delicate and difficult when we attempt unduly to interfere in it. We can coax people to do a good many things through appealing to public sentiment. They are willing to do a great many things if they are shown that those things are necessary and will help in winning the war; and I am free to admit that the Food Administration, in more than one particular, has accomplished an excellent work in pointing out to the public at large certain things which we must accomplish in the way of economy. I regret, however, that an attempt has been made to reduce the price of an article and in the same moment to increase the quantity produced, for down through thousands of years of history such attempts have proved unavailing.

Much has been said as to the guaranty which we can give to the farmer that he shall get a profitable price for what he produces. I doubt if any legislative decree or Executive order can guarantee an absolutely certain profit to a farmer on any product, particularly when we remember that this country is 3,000 miles wide in one direction and something like 1,500 miles wide in the other, and that no two sections of the country produce the same crop in the same way, or at the same cost. When we propose to go ahead and say that $2.20 a bushel will guarantee a reasonable profit to the man who raises wheat, we forget that the men of North Dakota do not raise wheat in the same way or in the same quantity as the men in New York, and that they can not be forced to do so. It is utterly impossible for them to do it. Local conditions prevent.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] yesterday, during the address of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], brought forth some figures as to the production of wheat. It turns out that for the 10-year period 1907 to 1916, inclusive, the average production of wheat in Ohio per acre was 15.9 bushels. In Maine during the same period it was 25 bushels per acre. Of course, $2.20 is a profitable price for the man who can raise, on the average, 25 bushels per acre. It becomes a question whether it is a profitable price at the present time if he can only raise 15.9 bushels per acre. When we come to North Dakota, with 11 bushels per acre, $2.20 per bushel does not seem quite rosy.

The vice of this situation is that no man can tell when he sows his wheat, and no government can tell before the wheat is sown or while it is growing, how much is going to be produced; and the whole secret of the cost of production lies in how many bushels you are going to get out of your acre. Last year it seemed wise, it seemed within reason, that $2 or $2.20 per bushel would give a reasonable profit to all the men who raised wheat; but it did not turn out to be the fact, for in a large section of the country they only raised 4 bushels per acre. In the State of New York it was profitable, because we raised over 20 bushels per acre. But while the State of New York prospered so far as its wheat producers were concerned, the States of North and South Dakota did not prosper, and just to that extent the production of wheat is discouraged.

Reverting again, Mr. President, to the talk about gamblers and speculators, may I point out another phase of this question which I think should have some consideration if we are to draw any lessons from the present situation?

Prior to the installation of the Food Administration there were no regulations governing the methods or the profits of the so-called middleman, who was so often dubbed a gambler or a profiteer. He was permitted to do business to the best of his ability, just as the farmer was permitted to do business. The middleman, of course, bought wheat as cheaply as he could, and he sold it as high as he could. He took his chances, and not all middlemen became rich. In fact hundreds, yes, thousands of them occasionally lost money. The farmer, of course, took his chances. When he planted wheat, he gambled. He could not help himself; and he gambled with an element over which he had no control whatsoever, and that was the weather.

The risk of a business operating under economic law should be distributed as evenly as may be over all the groups who are engaged in it. It should not under any circumstances rest upon the shoulders of any one particular group of people engaged in that business. When there was no interference or regulation over the middlemen or the millers in their purchase of wheat or their sale of flour, a part of the risk of the business rested upon their shoulders, and a part of the risk of the business rested upon the farmer who produced the wheat. Many, many times the farmer sold wheat to the elevator man, to the middleman, or to the miller at a certain price. After the miller had purchased it, it sometimes went down in price, and the miller or the middleman did the losing. In that way part of the risk was taken away from the farmer. Oftentimes the farmer sold wheat to the miller, and, after the miller got hold of it, it went up in price. That was to the miller's advantage; and whether it was to the farmer's disadvantage or not depends upon whether the farmer's price was one which paid him for his costs and gave him a little profit. Sometimes it did, sometimes it did not.

The condition to-day, however, artificial as it is, has utterly changed that situation. To-day, under the regulations of the Food Administration—and I am not contending that there should not be such regulations—the middleman bears no risk whatsoever. It is true that he is prevented from making an exorbitant profit, but he can not lose. He is guaranteed, in effect, a reasonable profit upon every bushel of wheat that he purchases from the farmer. He no longer bears any risk of the business; and it is not strange, Senators, that when that proposal was first made—the proposal that the middlemen and the millers should all be licensed and confined to a reasonable profit during the uncertain times of war—all the middlemen and millers were delighted. Of course, they were delighted, because they knew that the Government of the United States would always see to it, as a matter of good faith, that they secured a reasonable profit.

With all risk being taken from their shoulders, the entire risk of the business is now thrown down upon the farmer alone. His price is fixed. He can get $2.20 a bushel, no more and no less. If his crop is short, his market will not respond in the slightest degree in an upward tendency of the price of wheat. It makes no difference how few bushels per acre he raises; he can only get so much per bushel. Therefore he is completely at the mercy of the weather and the labor and other costs, which he has to endure in order to run his business.

The condition is utterly different from that which existed prior to these regulations going into effect. I hope that out of it will come a proper conception of the function normally to be performed by the middle man. I know in years gone by many farmers, a good many farmers' associations, agitated in favor of the elimination of the middle man, that he was an incubus pressing down upon the entire agricultural business, that he was the leech sucking it dry of all profit. Now that the middle man has been in effect eliminated the farmer must find as he is finding to-day that he has no one else in the world to share the risk of the business with him, and the quicker the middle man is brought back into the situation and permitted to assume some of the risks of the business the better it will be for the men who raise wheat.

Last August or September this would have been considered an unorthodox utterance in the Senate. I did not object to the regulation being imposed upon the middle man at that time, because I had no idea, neither had the Congress, that a price was to be fixed by the Food Administration on the farmer's wheat; but having fixed the price, saying to him, "You can get no more than that fixed figure," and at the same moment closing the grain exchange regulating all the practices of the miller and the middle man and the elevator man, the farmer is the only man to-day who takes any chances.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator wish to convey the idea that the farmer has been getting $2.23 for his wheat?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. NELSON. As a matter of fact the average price to the farmer has hardly been equal to $2—I mean the real farmer. Two dollars and twenty cents was fixed at the terminal market at Chicago, and when you subtract the railroad freight and the commission and the grading of the wheat, I do not think the farmer on an average got $2 a bushel.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to state that in my part of the country it did not amount to over $1.80 to $1.90.

Mr. WADSWORTH. By the use of the figure $2.20 I simply meant to give that as an example. I know, of course, that $2.20 was the Chicago price.

Mr. WARREN. Not only that, but the price of wheat where 11 bushels of wheat to the acre was raised would be common wheat; it would not grade up.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Whatever the price was in the particular district of the country, it was no more and no less than a certain figure; no matter what the weather has been in Idaho, no matter how many bushels per acre a farmer has raised in that State, he could not get more than $1.85. He took all the chances and the middle man took none, neither did the miller.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator from New York will permit me, it sold as low as $1.65, the red wheat, the large wheat.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For the purpose of my argument it makes no difference what the price was.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, if the Senator will allow me, it ought to be made clear at this time that not one-fifth of the grain actually sold measured up to the standard which would give even at the terminal $2.20 a bushel.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me repeat, I am only using the figure $2.20 to illustrate in round figures what the situation was, and I am not saying how many bushels per acre it is necessary to raise in order to make $2.20 a profitable price. I do not know. I have heard a great many men, some in the Senate, attempt to show how much it costs to produce a bushel of wheat. I declare that can not be done. I do not wish to be impertinent to any of my colleagues, but I suggest that there is no man in the Senate who can tell how much it will cost to produce a bushel of wheat in the United States in the season of 1918, because it all depends on how many bushels per acre will be raised.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest to him that the bulk of the wheat raised in this country is raised by small farmers where everybody works—boys and girls and everybody—and they get along without hired help as far as they can; and all the family get out of it is their living and their clothes and get a chance once in a while to go to a circus or to go to town on the Fourth of July. In a farmer's family you never can exclaim, as you do in other families, that "everybody works but father."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my remarks thus far have been general in character, and are directed only to a discussion of the fallacy which is so often enunciated, largely by city-bred people, by the editors of great metropolitan dailies, by magazine writers—the fallacy involved in an attempt to regulate by law the price of an article without having any other effect except upon that article. It can not be done and it never has been done. The discussion that has thus far taken place upon this particular amendment has in many instances illustrated what I mean. Much has been said about the increased prices which are being commanded by farmers for some of their products and the effect of those increased prices upon production. I think it can be taken as an axiom that the higher the price the greater the encouragement to produce, and the lower the price the less the encouragement. Some people can not believe that, but I think it is true, and I can give the Senate an illustration of the working of that law, not only the law of supply and demand, which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] thinks does not operate and can be suspended or displaced by something else, but the law of human nature; and I challenge him or anybody else to repeal a law of human nature.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. In confirmation of the suggestion made a moment ago by the distinguished Senator relative to the effect of attempting to control by legislation the prices, the Senator will recall that in the year 1765 and at an earlier date——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not recall that year.

Mr. KING. Of course it is not within the living recollection of the Senator, but with his profound learning, of course, he recalls from having read it that the Parliament of England attempted to fix and regulate the price of bread. It took only 17 pages to declare the rules and to regulate the price of bread, and then, after having accomplished that, they found it was essential to attempt to regulate other things in order to bring a sort of symmetry, and the regulation extended ad infinitum and brought increasing difficulties and trouble and confusion in the industrial system of the nation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the invariable history. Now, let me call the attention of the Senate to some of the testimony given by Dr. Warren, the head of the farm management department of the State College of Agriculture at Cornell, which is the agricultural college of the State of New York. Dr. Warren says:

> We have further evidence that the law of supply and demand is still acting. From Bradstreet's, a commercial magazine, I have drawn off the average prices of many commodities for five years preceding the war and compared them with prices on February 1, 1918. This list includes cottonseed oil, petroleum, sugar, iron, steel, wood, cloth, etc. Without going into great detail, I can say that in the entire list the lowest of all these is cheese, which shows an increase of 51 per cent.

That is the lowest increase. It shows an increase of only 51 per cent.

> The next lowest in the entire list is butter, which shows an increase of 62 per cent.

Both of them are dairy products. They stand at the bottom of the list of increases in price. Now, what result came from that in the State of New York?

Let me say to the Senate a State census of New York was taken a year ago and was taken this last February, and it is a house-to-house census. It is an exact count of everything affecting agriculture in the State.

> Our State census now shows that the number of heifer calves under 1 year old in New York State is 31 per cent of what it was a year ago, which is the largest decrease we have in any class of live stock—a direct reaction.

In other words, they are giving up the least profitable industry. Two-thirds less in number are heifer calves in the greatest dairy State in the Union, because dairying pays less than any other branch of farming. There is no government on earth can stop that, and we might just as well abandon the attempt. It is one of the laws of human nature which is allied with the economic laws.

Now, I dread that same thing happening to wheat. I do not want it to happen. This is a national question. It does not affect the State of New York alone.

Mr. GORE. It is an international question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. In reference to the subject mentioned, before the Senator leaves it, on the decrease of cows——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Heifer calves.

Mr. SHERMAN. The same thing holds good in the dairy country over in the Fox River Valley. Radiating in and about Elgin, Ill., and up about Waukegan, on the Wisconsin line, is a large dairy country that is tributary to Chicago. The Food Administration and the consuming public in Chicago were in a long controversy with the milk producers in the area referred to. It ended in fixing a price that was unprofitable to the milk producers. The result is in exact accordance with the principle stated by the Senator from New York. The milk producers, finding there is no profit in raising milk at the prices agreed upon to be sold and distributed for the Chicago market, are now engaged in turning the dairy cows into beef. There is one news item of many which I have followed in this part of the United States which, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to give to fortify the statement he made showing that it applies to other lines as well. Under the date line of March 3, Waukegan, Ill.:

> One thousand Lake County dairy cows have been sold within three weeks, according to G. Carroll Gridley, county food administrator, who resides at Libertyville. Most of them have been shipped to Chicago stockyards for beef.
> There are 1,200 milk producers in the Lake—

That is the county in which Waukegan is found—

> County association, said Mr. Gridley, and on the average they own 50 to 20 cows each.

That holds good generally of the entire Fox River Valley milk producing area. They are getting to a point where it does not pay and you can not force the farmer or milk raiser to produce the milk. That is in exact accordance with the statement of the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no question about it. It is simply another illustration.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I wish to add another instance. Oklahoma, of course, is not a dairy State. Muskogee is a city of thirty or thirty-five thousand people. I had a letter two days ago advising me that some 20 dairies had been abandoned in the vicinity of Muskogee within the last year; that one particular man had sold out his holding and was selling his dairy stock for beef cattle. One man having $3,000 invested sold out his entire stock. He said his family had worked from 4.30 in the morning until 9 o'clock at night, and he could take his team to the oil fields an make more clear money than in dairying. I mention that as marking the tendency clearly demonstrated by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I do not cite this instance in the way of attaching any blame whatsoever to the Food Administration or any law of Congress. So far as I know no law of Congress has affected the dairy industry, nor am I aware of any regulation of the Food Administration which has affected it adversely. I simply cite it to show that when a particular branch of agriculture becomes unprofitable farmers give it up; that is all; and I shall contend as long as I am permitted to raise my voice anywhere that no Congress by the enactment of a statute can prevent it nor can any food administrator or any power of government prevent it.

The result in New York, of course, goes in another direction, but it illustrates the same thing. The price of wheat being fixed at a level which makes it infinitely less profitable to raise than other grains and crops, the acreage of wheat in New York is going down. Instead of the Department of Agriculture's estimate of 512,000 acres for the State, this house-to-house canvass during January and December last shows there are only 361,000 acres, which is a falling off in the very article that we want most. That is the vice of this situation. We are trying to get something, and we are going about it in the wrong way.

As I said before, New York is not a great wheat State, and I am not speaking for my own State. I am speaking to the general situation, but proportionately it is the same in all States. This may seem more important at first blush to North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, and Kansas than it is to New York, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the State of New York contains more consumers than any other State in the Union, and I wonder what is going to become of those consumers if the wheat acreage goes downhill. To me that is infinitely more important than an increase of 30 cents a bushel in wheat, which is all that this amendment asks.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. While it is true that we do not have as accurate information about all other States as we have about New York, because, I think, it might be said that the information we have as to the State of New York is absolutely accurate, we do have information to the effect that in many of the wheat States the acreage of the winter wheat crop is at least 20 per cent less this year than it was a year ago. Is that not true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is my understanding, and, Mr. President, that kind of a situation, to be frank with you, alarms me. I can not view it lightly. Some may say that the people of the cities will never stand for an increase in the cost of flour. Their protest may be uttered, and it may be uttered for several weeks, and it may be uttered for several months, but that will not alarm me nearly as much as a decreased acreage in the wheat crop of the United States. If we have to pay a little more for flour in order to get enough flour then I say let us pay it. It is either cheap politics or an utter disregard of economic laws to insist that the producer has a selfish interest in the situation and that his selfishness is the only force back of this amendment. The consumer has an interest in it, Mr. President. His interest extends on into the future, for we must see to it, now that we have gone into this business of legislating about crops and prices—and I am exceedingly sorry we ever did it—we must see to it that in future the consumer will have enough to eat, no matter what it costs. That is my sole object in addressing the Senate upon this situation, conscious as I am that some of my observations will not be taken in good part by some good people of my own State, who, of course, being human, would like to buy flour even more cheaply than they are buying it now. My concern is as to what is to become of those people a year from now or two years from now when there may not be enough flour. The wheat reserves of the United States are practically gone to-day.

Mr. President, we had an enormous crop in 1915. The acreage was large, and the weather was favorable, but the acreage was large because the European war breaking out in 1914 led the average farmer to believe that the price of wheat would rise, and he put in a great acreage that winter and that spring. He did not get a tremendous price for it because it was one of the largest crops per acre that this country had ever produced.

In any event, the total was the largest, I think, in our history. The crop of 1916 was one of the smallest. We consumed in the United States and exported more wheat in 1916 than we raised, which meant that we invaded a part of the hold over of the 1915 crop. Again, in 1917 we produced one of the smallest crops on record; and, it being a second successive small crop, we again invaded what was left of the hold over of the great crop of 1915; and I tell the Senate that the reserve is nearly gone. I know it.

It is a serious situation, and the most important thing that you and I can do here, Senators, is to see to it that the next crop of wheat is the biggest we can make it, no matter what the cost is. We have only commenced on this question of wheatless days. It is going to be a good deal more severe within the next six months. We have got to send more wheat to our allies than we have been sending. We have only been sending something like two-thirds of what they figure as their minimum requirement. We have got to increase it, and we have only got just a little bit of the reserve left. At the same time, when we are threatened with a total wiping out of our reserve, we see signs of the wheat acreage being reduced. I suggest that you can not face a much more serious proposition than that; and if raising the guaranteed minimum price from $2.20 to $2.50 a bushel will tend to restore the wheat acreage, then I will vote for it, because I fear the possible alternative.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator yet adverted to the question of labor—the necessity of labor in order to produce wheat, even if the price of wheat is increased? What are we going to do for labor to take care of the farming situation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a pretty hard question to answer. It is one of the difficulties, of course, under which we as a Nation—I do not say only the farmers—are laboring.

Mr. BORAH. I did not know whether or not the Senator was going to discuss that question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The shortage of labor on the farms has a most intimate relation to the price of the farm product. If the farmer can get a good price with a good profit in it for what he raises he has some show of competing with the industries of the country in bidding for labor. Unless he is pretty certain of getting a good profit, he can not bid against the industries for labor. In the State of New York, in the two last censuses taken—one a year ago and one last February—it is clearly shown that there are 30 per cent fewer hired men on the farms than there were two years ago. That does not mean the sons of farmers, but the professional farm laborer. Of every seven of them, four have gone to the industries; not so many into the draft as has been supposed. Four out of seven have gone to the munition plants, to the industries, where they are getting from $4 to $8 or $9 a day. The farmer can not bid against those prices, and you can not blame the hired man for going to the industries.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from New York, of course, is correct in his statement that the industries have been drawing the laborers away from the farm, and that a large portion of them have gone away from the farm by reason of the increased prices which they can elsewhere realize. Nevertheless, the fact that labor had been reduced to a minimum upon the farm ought to have been taken into consideration in the execution of the draft law, because they were taken from the farm. The draft drew from that class of labor, which had already been reduced to a very small number. In view of the fact that the withdrawals from the farm had been so large in the past, that has had a very bad effect, so far as the future is concerned, upon the production of the farm.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the draft law contributed to the difficulty, and I am glad to see in the public press that in the operations of the draft law from now on special consideration is going to be given, so far as may be, to men still remaining upon the farms who are competent to do farm labor.

Mr. President, thus far I have not criticized the Food Administration and I do not intend to blame alone that administration or its head for this situation. I think we are all to blame more or less. The public itself is to blame to a great degree. The public was captivated last summer and last autumn by the talk of how we were going to reduce the cost of living and increase the food produced. We have now learned that that can not be done, and the quicker that is thoroughly understood the better. Unfortunately the Food Administration, I think—although I am not a mind reader—proceeded upon that same assumption with respect to the price of wheat, placing an average fixed price of wheat for the entire country, with the result that everybody who produced wheat at a cost in excess of $2.20 a bushel is wondering to-day whether he will continue in its production.

This proposal, as set forth in the pending amendment, is an attempt to cure that in part, at least. I do not know whether the proposed increase is enough; I do not know whether it is too much; but I know it is in the right direction. If it is done in time I know it will increase the acreage of spring wheat, and that is what we want to accomplish.

There are some other elements that have operated to the disadvantage of the prospective wheat production. When I say that I refer to some of the regulations of the Food Administration. The famous voluntary agreement which was entered into by something like 1,700 millers upon the request of the Food Administration, coupled with the licensing power which the Food Administration was authorized to exercise, brought about this kind of a situation: All the millers, as I understand it, agreed not to grind more wheat than an amount which would equal 75 per cent of the amount of wheat which they had ground the year before. I have never been able to find out why a limitation was placed upon the amount of wheat to be ground by a miller. I mean I have never been able to find out a convincing reason. The reason given to me is that the Food Administration, having taken under their wing and under their control all the millers of the country, made up its mind that no miller should have any advantage over any other miller proportionately in the matter of the amount of wheat which he could grind. The Food Administration made up its mind that no miller could make more money proportionately than any other miller during the grinding season. When they adopted that regulation they did not see what was coming. Of course it is perfectly fair to all the millers; each was permitted to grind just 75 per cent of what he had ground the year before; but when he ground his allotment and received a telegram from the Food Administration to stop grinding, of course, he could not buy any more wheat; and that meant the farmer could not sell any more wheat. I know of a case within 3 miles of my own home when a miller—a country miller—received such a telegram ordering him to grind no more wheat, and there were 17 wagonloads of wheat, with the farmers on the drivers' seats, waiting at the door of the mill to deliver it. They had to go home and take their wheat with them. What was the result? They fed the wheat to live stock; that was inevitable; and they are feeding it to live stock to-day. That is one instance; and that same thing has happened, I venture to say, Mr. President, at hundreds of other mills. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] only yesterday read a letter from one of his constituents, in which the writer said that he could not sell 900 bushels of wheat because the mills at Alliance, Ohio, were closed; so he had to take the 900 bushels back to his farm. He could not buy any bran because he could not get any wheat ground; he could not get any middlings, because he could not get any wheat ground; and he could not get any money; he could not get any cash for his crop, and so he took the wheat back. Are you surprised that there is an atmosphere of depression in the rural districts? Are you surprised that wheat is being fed to live stock when it is impossible for the farmer in many places in the country to sell it?

If I may criticize the Food Administration—and I do not want to be unfair or oversevere—I would say this: I think they have a splendid conception of wheat and meat and other products in vast quantities flowing in over the railroads to the elevators, to the packing houses, and to the coolers, and then flowing from the elevators to the millers and coming out in the shape of flour, or, in the case of meat, coming out in the shape of dressed beef. They have a splendid conception of what a million tons of meat mean and an excellent conception of what a million bushels of wheat mean and look like; they see that side of it; that is what they visualize; but, Mr. President, their vision does not extend up to the head of the creek, to the farmer and his team who haul in 30 sacks of grain to a local mill. That is what they do not see, and I fear it is because none of them have ever been there. It is, however, at the head of the creek—if I may use that colloquialism—where this whole thing starts; and if you dry up the source, if you discourage the farmer who hooks up his team on a winter's morning and puts on as many sacks of wheat as he can, if the road permits—and it does not always permit—and hauls it to his local mill, or if you create a state of affairs under which when he gets to that mill he is told the mill can not buy the wheat, then he is not in a very good frame of mind for planting more wheat.

That is one of the things that the Food Administration has done. They now admit it. They have been doing it for three months, and one of them, high in authority, assures me that they are going to try to stop that. Well, it is high time that it should be stopped. I imagine that no farmer would ever have suggested such a thing. It has cost the country I do not know how many thousands of bushels of wheat. The one mill that I happen to know of personally could have purchased 15,000 bushels, but it is not permitted to do so. It could have purchased those 15,000 bushels at any time during the last two months. Not only that, but that very regulation resulted in another situation. The flour mills in the East very often import from the Northwest spring wheat and grind it in the East. That is done in western New York, it is done in Pennsylvania, and I dare say it is done in New England and in Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator mean to say that the mill or the warehouse is forbidden to purchase and send on the wheat to a central market?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not forbidden to purchase wheat, but it is forbidden to grind flour, and being forbidden to grind flour, of course it will not buy wheat; it can not finance the transaction.

Mr. HARDING. Well, does the Senator mean to say that these mill centers are without purchasing warehouses for storage and facilities for the shipment of grain?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The places to which I refer are not mill centers, they are the small country town mills.

Mr. SHERMAN. And they have a very limited elevator space.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have a very limited storage space. A little while ago the Senator from North Dakota, or some other Senator on the floor, said that the great bulk of the wheat was grown by small farmers. That is true, and their immemorial custom has been to haul it to the local mill and have it ground as they wanted it. So, from time to time, when the roads are good, they haul their wheat in, and when the roads were bad they postpone hauling it in, but they have always been able to sell it; it is the one great cash crop.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from New York is absolutely right, according to my understanding. There would be no object for the miller to buy any more wheat than he is permitted to grind during the year; and, as the Senator from New York has well said, the millers are only permitted to grind three-fourths of the amount they ground the year before. It would not benefit the miller at all to be permitted to store more wheat, because he would not be able now to grind it, and not only has this resulted in a loss to the miller, but it has resulted in a great loss to the farmer, because it has caused an advance in the price of his feed, and he has in many instances been compelled to feed the whole wheat simply because he was unable to dispose of it and buy the ground feed.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from New York, I want to get the matter clear in my mind. Do the Senator from New York and the Senator from North Dakota maintain that these mills never buy in excess of their own grinding capacity, and that the small farmer has no means of transmitting his production to market except as the mills will grind the wheat?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The mills buy very little in excess of what they can grind; they can not do so, for they have not the storage space.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will permit me, the smaller mills to which he alludes have only so much elevator space. They buy in the expectation of milling the wheat and sending the flour out, so as to provide more space and thereby furnish a continuous local market. The farmer generally can sell at the local mill all that he cares to part with at the time; but this inhibition on milling the wheat into flour stops at once the local market. It did so in the Mississippi Valley section. I have numerous communications from millers in that part of the country showing that they have had exactly the same experience that is referred to by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The trouble is, Mr. President, that the Food Administration only saw the miller in this proposition. They have regulated the millers, I grant you that, and I am glad they are preventing the miller or any other middleman in this great emergency from making an exorbitant profit; but in regulating the miller and in endeavoring to put all the millers upon exactly the same proportionate basis of gross business they have forgotten that there are thousands of other men affected by their action, and affected in the manner which I have described. It has resulted in a waste of wheat and not in a saving. I am informed that they have reformed in that respect in the last few days; that they are now authorizing the local mills to grind up to the 90 per cent figure, and that there shall be reserved for the Government or for the grain corporation 50 per cent of the flour thus ground. They evidently do not want all that flour to go on the market and get out of their control at a time when they might need it to send abroad. They could just as well have done that before, but they did not happen to think of it. Regulation, when it is thoughtless, sometimes is very expensive.

In my section of the country it does not only affect the wheat that is grown locally; it does not only prevent the farmer from getting any money at all because of his inability to sell his wheat; but the spring wheat that was brought into that country—and I know of such instances—from the Northwest to be ground by the local mills and manufactured into flour and sold locally was not permitted to be ground. I know of a carload of it that could not be ground into flour and which was promptly sold for chicken feed, and it is gone.

It is necessary, Mr. President, if regulation is to be successful, to get very, very close to the persons you are regulating. The perspective, when the view is from a great distance, is not always accurate; but I am informed that that situation is being corrected, and I hope it is.

Mr. President, according to my way of thinking, the whole question in this situation is one of production. I expressed my grave concern last year, when the food-control bill was under discussion, on that one point. I feared then, and I fear more now, that the great American public does not appreciate the importance of production. I fear that in some instances the Food Administration and the administration generally has given more attention to price than to quantity. I fear that the consumer, so called, is in the saddle; and if the consumer is in the saddle, and rides it very long, the horse will give out.

I am convinced, from what little I know of it—and I have conversed with a great many people, and have listened to most of the testimony in the Agricultural Committee—that the present price of wheat fixed by the proclamation of the President is not enough to guarantee an increased acreage. With the acreage now in sight, the winter acreage only having been very slightly increased upon the most rosy estimates—and I have grave doubt as to their accuracy—with the winter acreage now in sight, it will take one of our most favorable years so far as weather is concerned to produce spring and winter wheat together to the amount of 700,000,000 bushels; and that is not enough. It ought to be much more. It ought to be 800,000,000 bushels, at least, in order to enable us to reaccumulate a little reserve, of which we have next to nothing to-day.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. Is it not too late to secure additional acreage for the spring planting now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think not.

Mr. CALDER. What time-limit can we figure on?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The spring planting goes on through March and April. I admit that the time is short. I wish this matter had been brought under discussion in December and January instead of this month. It is only recently that the seriousness of the situation has become apparent to a large number of people.

Mr. CALDER. Can not the President by proclamation increase the price to be given to the farmers of the country?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He can.

Mr. CALDER. Does the Senator know why he does not do it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume, of course, that he does not think it is necessary. I think in the proclamation in which he placed the price at $2.20 he said or intimated that any higher price than that would disturb wage scales. Two-dollar-and-a-half wheat, as contrasted with $2.20 wheat, would add perhaps $1.50, at the outside, to the cost of a barrel of flour. It might raise the cost of a barrel of flour to something like $12.50. That is less than one week's wages for the average working man, and the barrel of flour will last him for one year. I can not agree that it will disturb the wage scale, but it may add some thousands and thousands of acres to the wheat acreage; and that, I think, is one of the most important considerations in this whole war situation.

We must produce more than we are producing. We are not doing quite as well as we thought we would do in the matter of production of many articles. I do not want a repetition in the wheat fields of what occurred in the coal mines. We put the price of coal at the mouth of the mines too low, and mines closed down, and we lost coal production. Apparently that error is being repeated in Colorado to-day, where 55 mines have been closed because the price fixed by the Fuel Administration is too low.

I do not want to take that chance with wheat. I hope the price can be raised from $2.20 to $2.50. The American people and our allies will gladly pay the difference if they are assured thereby of getting all the wheat they want.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not going to enter upon a discussion of the wheat problem, which has been so fully discussed here. I agree that the key of this situation is production, but the attention of the executive departments has been given to reducing the cost of living. By yoking that up with the stimulation of production the result has been a decreased production.

I think that if the farmer had been let alone to find his market under market conditions he would be getting a price for his wheat to-day that would stimulate production. The minute you begin to fix the price you are met with the consumer, and then you put on a price at which the farmer will not be stimulated. It is in this connection, if the Senator in charge of the bill will permit me for a few minutes, that I want to call the attention of the Senate—it is the only way we can bring these things out—to this perpetual meddling that is going on with the American people in every form of business.

I hold in my hand a circular just issued by the United States Fuel Administration, through Mr. John L. Weaver, Federal fuel administrator for the District of Columbia. Their titles are always ample, if nothing else. Last year, as everyone knows, the filling of bins in the summer time, when railroad transportation was easiest and the consumption of coal least, was frowned upon—not only frowned upon, but people who attempted it were denounced as hoarders. That remained the policy of the Fuel Administration down to the appearance in the newspapers of the draft of the report of the subcommittee investigating the coal situation, which was prepared by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Then they changed their position and were going to encourage the filling of bins and laying in a supply of coal in the spring and summer months. As it happened, it came out very harmoniously just at the time—almost the very day—that I made my speech attacking their hoarding order of the previous year. It is in this connection that this circular is issued.

Here it is. If you do not tell the truth in answering these inquiries you are liable to a fine of $5,000 or two years in prison, or both; and these are the inquiries:

Name of dealer, ———.
Quantity required for year ending March 31, 1919, ———. Heater, ———. Range, ———.

I suppose the heater means the furnace—

Quantity desired for immediate delivery, ———. Heater, ———. Range, ———.
(If total requirement is over 6 tons, dealers can deliver only two-thirds of order.)
Quantity consumed during year ending March 31, 1918, ———. Heater, ———. Range, ———.
Quantity now on hand, ———. (See footnote.)

That gives an explanation of how you are to divide it up and how much you will get, and if you do not give the exact weight of the coal in your cellar you are in danger of paying a fine of $5,000 or going to jail for two years, or both—

Kind of building, ———.
Number of rooms, ———.
(Do not include bathrooms or halls.)

In many houses, of course, the house is largely heated from the hall. That is the chief delivery of heat from a furnace. Therefore you are to exclude it in giving the number of rooms—

Kind of heating plant, ———.
Have you any unfilled orders with other dealers? If so, amount and with whom, ———.
Heater, ———. Range, ———.

That seems to me paternalism run mad. Why can they not leave it to the American people to fill their bins, if they are not going to be denounced for hoarding? Why not say to the American citizen: "It is a good plan to fill your bins now; go ahead and do it," and bring in all the force of private interest behind the policy which they have finally determined is a wise one? Instead of that, they get out these sheets of questions, they harass people, they annoy people, they anger people, they prevent the carrying out of the policy that is required. It seems like nothing in the world but a desire to do something and meddle with every man's business; but it creates discontent, annoyance, and anger at a time when we wish to stimulate in every possible way unity, good feeling, and energy in the war.

We have had from the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] one of their performances in his State, by which they are reducing the output of coal in that State 7,000,000 tons a year—one of the greatest coal-producing States, naturally, in the Union—and here, in the cities of the East and among the consumers, they are getting out sheets of questions like this!

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he is familiar with many bin capacities which exceed a winter's supply of coal?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose most of the bin capacities are much too small for a winter's supply.

Mr. HARDING. I have heard of instances of that sort.

Mr. LODGE. I have had it suggested to me by personal experience.

This whole thing seems so utterly pointless. Why not say to the public just what they mean? Why not say, "We think it is a wise policy for you to store all the coal you can for the coming winter, and store it now and in the summer," and leave them to do it? The American people are fairly enterprising, and most of them are grown up. Why not leave them to do it themselves? Instead of that, we have a real estate dealer, a very worthy man, who comes in here and puts out this table of questions. Mr. President, it would be a pure farce if it did not go to the borders of tragedy in its effect on the public sentiment and the public mind at this time.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to ask the Senator if the questionnaire prescribes any particular rule of estimate as between the range and the heater?

Mr. LODGE. None. You are simply to give the amount that you have used in those ways.

Mr. HARDING. There is no strict rule of estimating?

Mr. LODGE. None; and in the example which they give in the note they say:

EXAMPLE.—Customer requires 12 tons for year ending March 31, 1919. Dealers can only make a first delivery of 8 tons. The amount customer has on hand April 1, 1918, must be deducted from said 8 tons.

If it is a good thing—as I believe it is, and as they now admit it is—to buy and store coal in the season of the year when it is simplest to do it, why not let them put all the coal they can into their bins? Why put them through all this sort of thing, make all this trouble, and hamper the doing of the thing which they now believe to be a good thing to do?

I do not want to weary the Senate with a discussion of coal. I have talked a good deal upon it, but there is nothing that we can do except what the Senator from Colorado said yesterday. The only thing we can do is to bring these errors and these abuses here and call attention to them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Massachusetts has called attention to the circular which he has just presented to the Senate, because I think the general policy of the Fuel Administrator, both as to producers and as to consumers, is injurious to both. The Fuel Administration is extremely and, I think, deservedly unpopular in the minds of consumers. If we focus the attention of the country upon these various methods of attack on the coal industry, which is raising havoc both with production and the distribution, we may possibly, after a while, in some direction, secure a little relief. I do not see any prospect of getting it in any other way. Out in Colorado at present, in addition to the wheatless days and the meatless days that the Food Administrator has imposed, the fuel commissioner has imposed sleepless nights. So we are doing our full bit out there.

Mr. LODGE. I quite agree with all the Senator has said. I think this is the only thing we can do to call attention to it. As to its effect, I am not oversanguine. I think it is adding to the unpopularity of the Fuel Administration as it gradually is pushed home in different quarters of the country; but growing unpopularity is no particular comfort as long as they remain in a place where they can acquire unpopularity.

I ask permission to print at the end of my remarks the circular to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the circular referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[United States Fuel Administration. John L. Weaver, Federal fuel administrator for the District of Columbia.]

APPLICATION OF CONSUMER FOR ANNUAL REQUIREMENTS.

In accordance with regulations of the United States Fuel Administrator, purchasers are required to make true declaration in answer to the following questions:

Date ———, 1918.

Name of dealer ———.

Quantity required for year ending March 31, 1919, ———. Heater ———. Range ———.

Quantity desired for immediate delivery ———. Heater ———. Range ———. (If total requirement is over 6 tons, dealers can only deliver two-thirds of order.)

Quantity consumed during year ending March 31, 1918, ———. Heater ———. Range ———.

Quantity now on hand ———. (See footnote.)

Kind of building ———.

Number of rooms ———. (Do not include bath rooms or halls.)

Kind of heating plant ———.

Have you any unfilled orders with other dealers? If so, amount and with whom ———. Heater ———. Range ———.

I hereby certify that the above statements are true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Name ——— ———,

Address ——— ———.

Any person who willfully makes a false statement upon the foregoing application is subject to prosecution under the Lever Act which imposes a penalty of $5,000 fine or two years imprisonment, or both.

Filed with fuel administrator for the District of Columbia ———, 1918.

By ——— ——— (Dealer.)

EXAMPLE.—Customer requires 12 tons for year ending March 31, 1919. Dealers can only make a first delivery of 8 tons. The amount customer has on hand April 1, 1918, must be deducted from said 8 tons.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, from the beginning I have opposed legislation of the character that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] proposes to amend. From the beginning I have realized that it was utterly futile to undertake to reverse all the processes of our national life and to repeal all the ordinary laws of business and of economics because somebody had a wild idea that somewhere else they were trying to do things of this sort and that we ought to ape them here.

Price control, Mr. President, has never succeeded in any way, in any country, or under any circumstances. It is utterly abhorrent to reason and the principles of common sense, and we need not expect to see it ever succeed, either here or anywhere else.

It may be true, Mr. President, that in times of national stress the Government may be justified, if it is necessary for the conduct of the war, in offering a bonus or a guarantee to stimulate production of any given commodity. That is the only possible way in which anything practical of this kind may be accomplished. Even then, unless the amount that the Government wishes to invest is practically unlimited, no considerable results need be either expected or hoped for from such an endeavor.

I have felt that way from the very beginning, as I said just now, with reference to matters of this sort. I have believed from the first that to enact legislation of the character of that which the Senator now seeks to amend is just like throwing so many monkey wrenches into the machinery, and I think the result has already proved the correctness of that contention, although it was by no means original with me or peculiar to myself. I believe every thoughtful man who ever considered the question, from the dawn of civilization up to the present moment, has always known that it was true.

Now, what are we now doing? The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] proposes to amend this so-called food-control bill in so far as the same relates to the price of wheat by changing the price that may be paid for wheat from $2.20 to $2.50 a bushel, and certain other minor amendments as to where the market price shall be fixed, and so forth.

Those of us who represent States which are not wheat-producing States but wheat-consuming States might well hesitate before we support this proposition. Indeed, taking the interests of the country as a whole, realizing that vastly more of the people are consumers of wheat than are producers of wheat, we might well hesitate to adopt any such proposal, if it were a mere question of what was desirable in the way of price control, but we can control this price no more than we can control conditions that are world-wide in their scope and reach. We must consider that we are confronted by world conditions and world necessities, and when we realize that a great part of the wheat-producing area of the world can no longer be utilized for that purpose, for one reason or another connected with this war, and when we realize that the demand for wheat is liable to grow in strength and in volume, it seems to me that with respect to this commodity it is very much like it is with respect to coal, that the most important thing to do is not to lower the price but to stimulate the production. Otherwise, the people of the world may not have enough bread, and if they can not get enough bread at any price, then the price, of course, becomes a matter of secondary importance; it becomes almost, if not quite, unimportant.

I believe that the world conditions are such that wheat production in this country must be stimulated to the utmost. I realize that the temptations to the farmer in the western and central western portions of the country to turn his activity to the production of other grains that are not controlled or hampered or monkey-wrenched by law has been so strong that unless we offer some additional inducement the necessary production of wheat may be greatly curtailed.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not understand that those of us who are from the wheat States asked for any legislation even to guarantee a minimum price.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know the Senator from North Dakota and many Senators from the wheat States made no such request, and I want to congratulate him and them on the common sense they displayed about this proposition. They said then, and they were everlastingly and eternally right, "Let us alone and we will raise the wheat in this country that will feed the world. Do not hamper us with useless, worthless, meaningless, and worse than worthless laws and we will do our part." I wish to God the American Senate and the American Congress had taken their advice.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me further, I think our prediction, I am sorry to say, has become true. We said last year that the production of wheat would decrease and not increase, and that the price of other products would increase far above that of wheat, which is more valuable for food than these other products. Take the grain which we call rye, which weighs only 56 pounds to the bushel, and it is selling at the terminal market for $3 a bushel. Barley, 48 pounds to the bushel, is selling away above wheat, at $2.30 and $2.35 a bushel, which is very much inferior in food value to wheat. The American consuming public are paying for it, and instead of helping the public to get cheaper food we are penalizing the public and making them pay higher for food products.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator. I remember the prediction of several of the western Senators made at the time on this very line, and I want to add my testimony to their statements. The result has borne out the accuracy of their predictions. It was utter nonsense, with all respect to the Senate, to undertake to regulate this sort of thing by statute law. We have demonstrated it, I think, to the satisfaction of a great many who then doubted, or professed to doubt, the truth of that position. It is a truth as old as Adam Smith himself—nay, it is as old as human civilization and intelligent thought itself. But here we are in the middle of a bad fix on this question and a good many others.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think several times the Senator has assumed that Congress was responsible for the price fixing by this committee. If Congress is responsible for this price fixing, of course we must find the authority in some bill that Congress has passed. I should like to have the Senator point out to me any bill that Congress has passed which authorizes the Food Commission to fix a price upon the 1917 crop or to fix a price upon any other crop raised by farmers.

Mr. HARDWICK. Except the minimum price guaranteed, does the Senator mean?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; that guaranty was simply this. Congress said to the farmer "we want you to sow wheat for the 1918 crop. Now, we will not interfere with the law of supply and demand unless the price should drop below $2 a bushel at the terminal market, and to protect you, to insure you that you shall have a fair price, we will guarantee that if it does fall below that we will take the wheat off your hands at that price," and we made provision for that. We did not tell any commission to fix a price, and the price fixed by the commission related entirely to the 1917 crop. Now, where under the law was the authority given to this commission, or any other commission to fix the price of wheat?

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me ask the Senator a question or two, in turn, and then I will try to answer his question, for it is a reasonable one. Under what authority of law would he assume to exercise such a power now?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not assume to exercise it. We granted a power to license factories to produce things for the American people to prevent exorbitant charges, or, in other words, to prevent an attempt to hold up the American people. There was nothing in that grant of power which included the right to determine what those factories should pay to the producer for what they purchased from the producer, but under the operation of this commission they have assumed the authority, and without any basis, to say to the manufacturer, "You can not continue in business unless you buy the product you manufacture at very much less than the real value of the article." Now, where did they get the authority?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will permit me to answer his question, they get it, so far as they get it at all, from this indirect method of controlling the price business, namely, by the license system; and let me say to the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator think they have the right indirectly to do it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think they have.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not either.

Mr. HARDWICK. But I did not have the slightest doubt at the time we passed this legislation that they would do it, and if the Senator will go back to the RECORD of those days he will find that I stood on the floor of the Senate and warned the Senate that this exact thing would be certain to happen. They have gone further than that——

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator think that Congress had a right to assume and that individual Senators had a right to assume that all authority exercised under the law would be in conformity with it and not against it?

Mr. HARDWICK. But the Senator, of course, puts his own judgment up as conclusive as to what is in conformity with the law and what is in conflict with it. I refer to any Senator. I do not mean the Senator from North Dakota any more than the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will excuse me, I think that my judgment corresponds with the judgment of the Senator from Georgia and the judgment of every Senator on this floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. That may be; but after all the language in which we conferred that power, the license section of the law, was so broad that it was capable of almost any construction and capable of almost any sort of a use. I remember standing on this floor and pointing out to this body that not since the days of Tiberius Cæsar had any monarch on earth been invested with such vast and limitless power over the business and industry of even a country in which the government was a despotism. They have gone even further than that in this country. They assume to say to every merchant in this country, under this same licensing system, "If you do not do exactly what we tell you to do, sell exactly what we tell you to sell, on each day as it comes, sell a certain proportion of wheat and a certain proportion of some substitute for it at the same time, to an unwilling customer, you can not do business in this country."

Ah, Senators, when we grant power limitless, with no limit whatever, with no stop whatever, with no halt whatever in it, unless it rests within the breast and conscience of the administrator of the law, then we have departed a long way from representing a free people who are supposed to have rights and liberties that are not lightly to be either suspended or surrendered.

We complain about these laws, although we vote for them, in the face of repeated and reiterated warnings that this is certain to happen under such laws. The time has come, the hour has struck, to call a halt in all that sort of business. It boots us nothing, it profits us nothing. It does not speed the war. It does not advance the cause of this country. It is utterly absurd for the Senate to think that by granting all this power in every direction this body is doing anything to further the prosecution of the war. If that contention is to be granted in anything like its entirety, we admit the failure of republican government and the doom of republican institutions. If it is to be seriously contended in this body or anywhere else that we can only crush an autocracy across the sea by establishing first an autocracy here, then it becomes pertinent to propound once more the question asked by the Saviour of mankind almost 1,900 years ago, "What is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

The very reverse of this proposition is true. This country will be stronger in the war, greater for war, more powerful to wage it, if the rights and liberties of every citizen are preserved unimpaired, and the American citizen will be a better patriot, aye, a better soldier on the battle fields of France or anywhere else, if he continues a free man and continues to possess a country that is fit to live in and fit to die for.

We make for nothing by this abandonment of democratic principles. We make for nothing except our own undoing by these desertions, continual and unending and unceasing, of the great fundamentals on which rest the rights and liberties of the American people.

For one, I am tired of the performance. I have not gone very far with it myself, but I think we all ought to stop. The time has come to call a halt on these things. Let us quit granting away all the liberties of the people every time we meet so that after a while if we keep it up we will have to begin to take an inventory, and it will not take much paper to carry it on, each night as we adjourn, to see how much of our liberties are left.

As far as the bonus feature of this wheat proposition is concerned, I believe the world conditions are such as to demand and require as a matter of policy that if we are to give a bonus at all we shall increase it and enlarge it in order to stimulate American productivity in this particular line. Entertaining that view, I shall support and vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want the attention of the Senator from Georgia for just a moment, because it has been often asserted upon the floor of the Senate in the discussion of this matter that Congress gave to the Food Commissioner the authority which he is now exercising, and that therefore Congress is responsible for what is being done under the exercise of that authority.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator allow me? Of course, the Senator did not understand me to make that assertion. I have never rested under that delusion. It all comes from the stretching of the licensing power, and I knew it would come from that.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is what the Senator said a very short time ago, namely, that the powers granted were so extensive as to justify or excuse almost any construction of that license clause. I want to show the Senator that that license clause is not subject to any such construction as is given it. The purpose is clearly set forth in its words, and what it is intended to accomplish and the punishment for a disobedience are also set out just as clearly.

I want to read that clause, which is section 5 of the food act, and ask the Senator again, or anyone else, to point out to me one single clause that would justify a price-fixing schedule that would affect the producer. Section 5 reads as follows:

That, from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section.

Now, that is the law authorizing him to grant licenses. Then it proceeds:

The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees.

Now—

Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice.

That is aimed entirely to storage charges, to profit charges by the licensee upon the article which he manufactures or sells. Is there one single word within that which authorizes the President or anyone else to say to the licensee you must pay a certain price and not one penny more for the thing you purchase? Not one word. All the government that you exercise over the licensee is a government affecting his profits above what he pays, and there is not a single word within it referring to what he shall pay for the raw material.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I suggest to the Senator, while it is a very strained construction, and, as I said a moment ago, one of which I do not approve yet, I can not see, under that language and under the particular powers conferred, why they have not as much right to say to a licensee "we will prescribe how much you shall pay for things" as to say to the licensee "we will prescribe how much you shall sell things for."

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the wording of the law all the commission has the right to say to the licensee is, "Your charges are exorbitant or extortionate, and you must reduce them within a reasonable basis."

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator that, in my opinion, the language is somewhat broader than that. They can regulate any practice or regulate any sort of a business dealing they have with anybody, and it is on both sides of the ledger, both as to buying and selling.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think if the Senator will read the section a little further he will see that not only the spirit but the wording of the act shows conclusively that it is intended to deal only with extortionate charges, because it provides further, in the same section:

The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence.

So when you get through with this license section there is not a word within it, in my opinion, that could possibly justify a commission in dictating to the licensee what it shall pay for products that represent the greater value of the wealth produced in the United States in a single year.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to ask the Senator just one other question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator think under that language the power is given or was intended to be given to this food controller to go out to all the retailers of the country and say to them you shall sell bread one day and meat another; you shall do this and do that and do the other, according to an arbitrary regulation issued by a Federal bureau here in Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. HARDWICK. Which shall say you shall buy oatmeal when you buy flour or you shall buy some other substitute when you buy flour?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is an arbitrary rule. In other words, there is no law to compel me to desist from eating meat on Friday or Saturday or any other day, if I choose to do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no; but on the individual citizen it operates the same way, because if any one of these licensees disobeys in the smallest or most minute particular then he is notified he can no longer do business. That threat is held over his head, and they practically enforce whatever they desire, although the lawmaking body may have never dreamed that such a program was in contemplation or was possible.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator asked me whether or not there is authority given here to say to a retailer that he shall not sell chickens one day and then sell pork another day. I say candidly there is no such authority given.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly on all fours with your wheat case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Exactly; and therefore those who supported this food proposition can not be charged in any way with having supported or voted in favor of the exercise of the authority that is attempted to be exercised to drive down the price of any product.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, many individuals in very high places have endeavored to state the conditions upon which war may be terminated, such as Lloyd-George, Mr. Asquith, M. Clemenceau, the President of the United States, von Bethmann-Hollweg, of Germany, Count Czernin, of Austria, his holiness, Pope Pius X, and others, each giving their point of view. The difficulty with these expressions, all of which have value, and some of which have very great value—such as the most recent declarations by the President of the United States on January 8 and February 11, 1918—is that they are not the combined, adequately authorized, or sufficiently convincing declarations of organized governments.

The British Parliament is, according to the last dispatches, now considering a league of nations. Many public men begin to see it. The Saturday Evening Post of March 9, 1918, has the following editorial:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, March 9, 1918.]

A GOOD TIME TO START.

A resolution introduced in the Senate last August by Mr. OWEN directs the President to invite all ally and neutral nations to send delegates to a conference for the purpose of discussing a league of nations to maintain peace.

There was no difficulty in getting representatives of the United States and ally nations to a conference at Paris for the purpose of discussing war measures. A conference to discuss international organization presents hardly greater difficulties.

Organizing a régime of international law and order is a big and difficult task—probably the biggest task to which statesmanship has ever addressed itself. Many pregnant details must be considered. Many differences of opinion will develop. Which is all the more reason for making a beginning. It need distract no particle of energy or attention from the prosecution of the war.

On the main point an overwhelming majority of the people of every country in Europe and America agree—the point that the world must be intelligently safeguarded by some system of international organization against a repetition of this calamity. A few individuals here and there may speak differently, but they represent no considerable body of opinion anywhere in the world. A government or an official that dissents from the main point does not represent the people.

There must be a preliminary conference sometime to sketch a plan. Such a conference now could agree upon an outline; and an outline, of however general a nature, agreed to by a representative international conference, would be a capital stroke for speedy and acceptable peace. Its influence, within Germany and without, would be important.

Unrepresentative government pushed the world into this war. Unrepresentative government is not unknown at times even among democracies. Mere governmental indifference has defeated many a good project. All governments will be busy enough directly after the war. The favorable juncture for launching an international organization may slip by, which would be a betrayal of the people of the whole world.

A start, a definite beginning, is necessary. Public opinion should demand it.

Mr. President, in order to put an end to war, in my judgment, the principles of international law should be declared, as far as coherence of opinion makes possible, by the great organized governments of the world in a definite treaty or joint declaration, and having declared these principles these governments should be prepared to enforce the principles by whatever means they may have at their disposal.

Men do not easily understand abstractions. I therefore venture to make a concrete proposal as follows: Let the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, China, Belgium, Greece, Roumania, Serbia, Montenegro, Portugal, Siam, Cuba, Liberia, Brazil, and Panama enter into a treaty declaring the fundamental rules of international relationship, and, since no rule rises to the dignity of law unless it is enforced or enforceable, let them provide the means by which these principles shall be enforceable. In addition to the force of arms, I venture to suggest means by which they can be enforced through commercial or financial pressure. This treaty should be open to the adherence of all other nations, and if they desire to cooperate in the framing of the treaty I think they should be permitted to do so. But the principles ought to be laid upon the table so that the whole world may see what they are, so that the whole world may know that these principles will not be set aside or modified by any secret diplomacy around a council table where trading and trafficking of individual interests may affect these fundamental principles upon which the public opinion of the world is really agreed.

First. I take it that these principles should be as follows: The right of every civilized nation and self-governing people to exercise the unquestionable right of internal self-government, with exclusive control within its own territory over immigration, emigration, imports and exports, and all internal affairs.

Second. The right of complete territorial integrity.

Third. That the oceans and high seas should be free and open under international rules; that all international waterways, straits, and canals should be open on equal terms to the citizens of all nations; that the right of access to the sea by shipment in bond without tax through intervening territory should be conceded; that international disputes should be definitely settled by arbitration; that the invasion of the territorial integrity of one nation by another on any ground should be regarded as an international high crime, the offending nation to be held an international outlaw; that subordinate nations or colonies backward in education, industrial and economic development, and in the knowledge of the principles of government should have their rights safeguarded on the basis of the principles of freedom, humanity, and justice by international agreement under the patronage of its patron civilized nation; that nations cohering with this program and willing to terminate the present war upon these principles shall be entitled to equality of treatment in commerce.

That each of the existing nations in July, 1914, shall be content with its boundaries as they then existed. That territory over which there existed a dispute prior to the war, such as Alsace-Lorraine and terra irridenta, shall be assured unembarrassed self-determination under international law. That when the war terminates, by the adherence of nations to this program, or by force of arms, immediate disarmament shall take place on land and sea to a point not to exceed internal or local police purposes, and the quota required for the international army and navy apportioned according to agreement of the respective countries adhering to this program. That an international force shall be arranged by agreement for the purpose of making effective the rule of international law.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious, in spite of all pretenses of a merely defensive war, that the military masters of Germany are waging this war for purposes of conquest, for purposes of material profit, for the purpose of "annexation and indemnity," by capturing and digesting weaker neighbors and using their wealth and man power as a military asset. It is perfectly obvious that this war is being waged in the interests of the property-owning classes of Prussia and of the German Empire—the bankers, merchants, and manufacturers, who, by the German military machine, have been able by military force to reduce Turkey, Bulgaria, and Austria to a condition of vassalage as a means of promoting their private fortunes at the expense of the balance of mankind.

There is available to the entente allies a means of influencing the opinions of these unscrupulous selfish interests, and that is by serving notice on them that the allied nations will use their power over the sea and the seaports of the earth to exclude them absolutely from commercial intercourse with the balance of the world if they do not at once agree to the reasonable rules of international law, which are laid down between the nations as proposed, or as shall be proposed, when this matter has been carefully and thoroughly digested and considered. The way in which to do this is for the United States, England, France, Italy, and Japan, with the adherence of other nations who may be in accord, to conclude a further convention, solemnly and irrevocably binding themselves that unless the military masters of Germany make peace on the terms proposed within 30 days after the ratification and publication of the convention, that the signatories agree that for a period of five years from date they will—

First. Refuse clearance to any of their vessels to any German port.

Second. Refuse entry to any of their ports of any vessel under the flag of Germany or any vessel under any other flag engaged directly or indirectly in trade with Germany or owned in whole or in part by any subject of Germany.

Third. Prohibit the exportation, direct or indirect, of any merchandise, goods, wares, raw materials, or other natural products, whether of domestic origin or of foreign origin, to Germany.

Fourth. Refuse to permit the importation, direct or indirect, of any merchandise, goods, or wares, whether of domestic origin or foreign, from Germany.

Fifth. Prohibit the exportation, direct or indirect, to Germany of coin, bullion, or paper money or securities, or any other form of indebtedness, of bills of exchange and other negotiable instruments, of banking or commercial paper.

Sixth. Forbid any postal arrangement, telephonic or telegraphic communication with Germany, or with any person in Germany.

Seventh. Prohibit the transfer to their own nationals, either directly or indirectly, of any stocks, shares, mortgages, or other forms of indebtedness owned by a subject of Germany, and confiscate all property owned in the entente allied countries by Germans residing in Germany as an indemnity to their own nationals owning property in Germany.

For every 30 days succeeding the first period of 30 days in which the military powers of Germany refuse to make peace, one year shall be added to the five years as above specified.

If Germany adheres by formal acceptance of the principles of international law above laid down by resolution of the Reichstag approved by referendum by the German people and agrees to begin immediately and coincidently the demobilization of her armies, an armistice shall be declared and negotiations immediately begun for the specific terms of settlement of other questions. But that she must definitely agree in advance of the armistice that Belgium, Serbia, and occupied territory of other nations shall be evacuated and reparation made to Belgium and Serbia.

Mr. President, the allies control the seas and are in a position to demand of the masters of Germany the establishment of these rules of international decency, because the propertied classes of Germany will be reduced to bankruptcy unless the military masters of Germany yield to the demand of the civilized world for a cessation of the wholesale murder brought upon the world by the unethical ambitions of this military group.

The German people themselves have not the power to revolt against their military masters, but the military masters of Germany can not carry on the war if the commerce of Germany is destroyed and its financiers are bankrupt, nor unless the German people continue their approval.

The German military authorities vainly imagine that by a show of arms they can obtain a peace, a "German peace," so called, which means a peace of German victory, in which they shall dictate to the balance of mankind the conditions of peace, and in which they may prepare themselves for another war of dominion. The only way to end this ambition is to convince the propertied class of Germany that they face destruction if the military leaders of Germany persist in using the German people as a war machine to destroy the liberties of mankind.

The working classes of Germany know perfectly well that no military victory can possibly compensate for the loss of the free and open markets of the world, for the cutting off of their shipments, for the closing of their factories and industries, to the markets of the world.

This is not a proposal to make war after war. This is not a proposal of an economic boycott after the war. It is a proposal of giving equality in the commercial life of the world to the people of Germany if they accept the reasonable doctrines of international law which will assure the liberties of the world against the militarism of Germany.

The military masters of Germany can not be affected by threats of an economic boycott. They have no fear economically after the war. They are convinced that the Americans, the English, the French, the Japanese, and the Italians are mere dollar-chasing people, they will all be so anxious to make money after the war that none of them will question where the trade comes from.

The German military business and financial rulers think only in terms of dollar diplomacy, but they will be able to understand the force and significance of the policy now suggested. They will recognize the importance of a solemn treaty agreement, irrevocably binding its signatories and representing the opinions of three-fourths of mankind. They will recognize the solemn judgment of the peoples of all the world allied against German militarism.

The plan which I propose would be an act of war if the world were at peace, but now that the world is at war this proposal will bring peace or fix the responsibility for further human slaughter upon the military masters of Germany, and punish them in their most tender spot.

When the nations of the world declare before all the world the decent terms by which peace can be made; when there is nothing left to secret bargaining, to chicanery, to the trickery of unscrupulous negotiators; when the objects for which the allies are fighting are laid bare with accuracy, we reach a point at which a peace based upon understanding, based upon justice, which include mercy and humanity, may be arrived at.

At all events, Mr. President, I have thought it my duty to make this suggestion for the consideration of thoughtful men in the United States. The sovereignty of the United States is vested in the people. The United States is controlled by public opinion. The executive and legislative branches respond alone to public opinion. I make this suggestion in the hope that it may be improved upon and may be useful in bringing an early end to the wicked slaughter of the beloved youth of the world.

Where no counsel is, the people fall; but in the multitude of counselors there is safety.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this proposed amendment of the food act attached to the appropriation bill on the agricultural items would carry out what was undertaken in the original act approved on the 10th day of August, 1917. If it were not that in all ordinary affairs the comic always treads on the heels of the tragic, I would forbear to make some observations which I am moved to make, but it seems like there is a very undefined line between some of these sober affairs and those that savor rather of the humorous or ridiculous. We have not gone as far as we could. I read from paragraph 20, on page 15 of some regulations from Document No. 47 of the Senate of the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, which contains this language:

(E) KEEPING OF PIGS NOTWITHSTANDING BY-LAWS.

20. With a view to maintaining the stock of pigs in the country, any local authority by whom a by-law has been made which is for the time being in force prohibiting, restricting, or regulating the keeping of pigs, may grant permission, either generally or in particular cases, to keep pigs, notwithstanding or contrary to any provisions of any such by-laws, subject, however, to the observance of any directions of the local authority in the interests of public health.

That is a suspension of the ordinary laws against raising pigs inside of densely populated areas and is found in the regulations of the British Parliament or a rule promulgated by the food department, being first authorized by an act of Parliament; so they recognize the importance of one of our staple food-producing animals even in the Old World. Not only do I read that to show that the production of food is important, meat as well as breadstuffs, but to show that even the humble porker has not escaped the vigilant attention of the English Parliament. How it ever this long escaped the attention of the Food Administration in this country deponent saith not.

I call the attention of the Food Administration to this very manifest omission. I notice on my trips around Washington very many points where pig pens might be maintained without serious detriment to the public health. Only yesterday morning, it being one of the few sunny days when the open cars made their appearance, I passed on the way down to the Senate Office Building a garbage cart filled with pig food. The odors were not exactly those of "Araby the blest," but I remembered that I was living in the model city of the world. Notwithstanding the fact that towns of 10,000 population now have regulations that garbage shall be taken care of by nighttime, still in this model city its collection begins with sunrise, or will begin then under the provisions of the new daylight-saving act, and proceeds without intermission until the gloaming, as the poets put it; so that we may have under the blessed administration of the food law and the police regulations of this city whiffs from these garbage carts that will cut down the appetite so as to conserve the supply of food.

The Food Administration has overlooked, in its vigilant combing of every means of reaching the citizen, the fact that if there had been a convenient pig pen in my part of the town the garbage would not have needed transportation down New Jersey Avenue within two blocks of the Capitol; it could have been fed on the spot, and the ultimate consumer would have saved the transportation, which is now a very material question.

I commend to the head of the Food Administration this suggestion as to the lack of conservation. If the British Parliament or the Food Department in England can take it up, why can not we? We have been copying England in everything else; let us copy her in the matter of pig pens. I almost catch myself dropping my h's, and if Washington were not a dry town I would be calling for ale and wearing tweeds before the 1st day of June. Why the Food Administration has omitted this regulation I can not tell, except that in its multitudinous activities it has not had time to reach it; and I think I am performing a kindly act in reminding it of the condition as well as the opportunities for entering a fresh field requiring more appropriations.

In order to show you in war times how vigilantly all other of these small items are attended to, I read from the Official Bulletin of March 19, 1918. I know that all these matters are insignificant of themselves, but it is out of trifles that the larger things grow, on the good New England maxim, that if you take care of the pennies the dollars will take care of themselves. I read in this vehicle of censored news and receptacle of all official information the following, that must be inspired by the food department:

Hot cross-buns, which are sold and eaten on Good Friday, will not be coated with icing this year, according to an announcement by the United States Food Administration.

Hot cross-buns are considered as bread by the Food Administration, and rule 1 of the baking regulations forbids the use of icing and limits the amount of other ingredients in bread and rolls.

Well, I presume that no complaint can be made; but I never understood that a hot cross-bun was bread until it was officially defined in that way. Back in my childhood days, or even yet when I am in the company of children on hot-cross-bun day, I have universally regarded such buns as confectionery, not as a necessity, but as a luxury. Here, however, it is officially defined as bread and made the subject of about one-quarter of a column, in spite of the high price of print paper and other of the et ceteras of the Government Printing Office used in this momentous announcement.

There are many of such items in this same publication, and I only select this as a sort of sample of many others that are contained in this grave vehicle of information. I note under order No 1177, effective on March 15, 1918, from the office of the Postmaster General, under the date line of March 18, 1918, that—

Live day-old chicks shall be accepted for mailing, without insurance or C. O. D. privileges, when the package in which they are contained is properly prepared and can be delivered to the addressee within 72 hours from the time of their mailing.

Then follow directions as to how they are to be prepared for transportation, among which are the following:

Handle with especial care packages containing day-old chicks.
Do not give food or water to the chicks while in transit.
Dispatch as quickly as possible, and deliver to addressees promptly upon arrival at offices of destination.

That can not be done. Five days is now the average time between my office and Chicago. I mailed a letter on the 14th day of February, 1918, which has not yet reached its destination. On that date I addressed to a bank in Illinois, in the usual office envelope, a letter inclosing a check. That letter, as I have stated, has not yet arrived, according to the information from the bank. So I do not seriously question that they intend that prompt delivery shall be made at the destination, but I do question the performance of the intention. There are a number of other directions given which take up almost an entire column of the Official Bulletin.

I wish, along with this effort to control the price of wheat, to interpolate that when the food-control bill was under discussion at the last session many criticisms were made on this proposed undertaking. They were made because many Senators were doubtful about the ability of any person to whom power should be delegated by Congress properly to perform that function. As it is, prices are fixed and markets are made by everybody. No one single intelligence makes a market; it is made by every person in active life among a hundred million people. An attempt by legislation to substitute any single intelligence or any series of minds in the price-fixing undertaking is doomed ultimately to failure. I know that, as a means of passing the food-control bill, the price of $2 a bushel on wheat was inserted, but the $2 price is not for the kind of wheat that ordinarily is handled in large bulk.

The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets.

There is practically no No. 1 northern spring wheat sold on the market. It may be a matter of merchandise, but in filling contracts, or in the ordinary transactions of the grain exchanges of the country, or in the milling of the flour supplies, No. 1 northern spring wheat is so high grade an article that it is not ordinarily found on the market. That, however, is the basis. That at $2 per bushel means a considerable scaling of the $2 from the guaranteed price if the lower grades are considered. That provision in section 14 of the act approved August 10, 1917, was the motive power that pulled the bill through the Senate.

If this provision had not been in the bill, it is extremely doubtful whether it would have met with as favorable a reception as it did. It was inserted in the bill, therefore, for a two-fold purpose. One was to give strength to the bill and the other was to satisfy those who were sincerely fearful that it would interfere with the production of wheat during the ensuing year, that it would interfere with the fall sowings of wheat in the country, and would have a material effect this spring on the areas where spring wheat is the staple crop.

At any rate, it passed. Now we are engaged in a controversy over the impossibilities created by the exercise of this unwarranted power. We have found that it is impossible to adjust the market on the two-dollar-a-bushel wheat basis. When we endeavor to adjust the market on that basis we are immediately confronted with the prices of other articles that may be used as substitutes for wheat, and, related to wheat, a great variety of other merchantable articles that we are compelled to buy with our money. Other things not having prices fixed rise, while wheat does not. Therefore the purchasing power of the money on other articles has been affected by this unwarranted interference by Congress with the laws that heretofore have made prices. Who will raise wheat when its price is out of its natural relation to other merchandise?

We did another thing not long ago. I think the bill is now before the President, but possibly he has signed it. A daylight-saving bill has been enacted. I do not anticipate that it will produce such results as are promised. I only mention it as a part of this general program of attempting the impossible by legislative enactment. It is of no consequence that we set the clock forward one hour, or, in the wintertime, that we set it back an hour; it will not change the habits of people. If Congress passes some kind of a law, or a regulation is made by a department, that will compel people to get out of bed an hour earlier in the morning, and to go to work an hour earlier in the morning or later in the evening, and to adhere strictly to their tasks during the working hours when the sun furnishes us with natural light, something will be accomplished. Will the daylight-saving bill repeal one solitary rule of a union at any place in this country? Will it add anything to the eight-hour workday? Will it add another hour to the seven hours of the clerks in the Government departments here and elsewhere? Will it interfere in any way with the hours that women are allowed to work under the police laws of the different States?

We seem to have an idea that all we need to do is to enact some kind of a measure here, and the desired result is accomplished. No greater deception was ever practiced upon any person than for him to deceive himself. I can not think, in a legislative sense, of anything that reaches the incomparable folly of legislation of this character. Other bills of the same kind, which are subject to the same criticism, have matured into laws by the ordinary parlimentary processes. We are attempting to interfere with the laws of human nature.

The industrious person gets out of bed, whether the sun rises or not, at an hour that will give a fair day's work, and keeps at it a sufficient number of hours. We are suffering now from artificial regulations of all kinds. I ask no union to fix my hours of labor. When I return to manual labor as my daily occupation, I will not permit any union in this country to fix the hours that I labor. It is none of its business. If I am my own controller of my time, I will work within the limitations of health and daylight so long as I please. If I am working for an employer, I will meet his requirements. Still, by the daylight-saving law, like these pieces of ineffable balderdash in fixing prices of staple articles on the market, we are supposed to be able to reverse the laws that were here before the Senate was created, the laws that are inherent to human nature, habits that have become fixed and that we have exercised in the hours that we devote to labor, when we leave our places of residence, and when we retire. These are the underlying principles that govern a day's work; not mere matters of legislation.

Mr. President, contrary to all precedent, and with a full knowledge of the grave setting of the stage, I intend, in order to give point to the superlative folly of this legislation, to quote from a philosopher known as Abe Potash. His constant associate is Morris Perlmutter, and he says:

"There's a whole lot of people which ain't got enough will power to get up until their folks knock at the door and say it is half past 7 and are they going to lay in bed all day, y'understand, which in reality, when the clocks are set ahead Mawruss, it would be only half past 6."

"But don't you suppose that lazy people read the newspapers, the same like anybody else, Abe?" Morris asked. "Them fellers would know just as good as the people which is trying to wake them up that it is only half past 6 under section 2a of chapter 514 of the laws of 1918, entitled 'An act to save daylight in the State of New York for cities of the first, second, and third classes,' y'understand, and they will turn right over and go on sleeping until 8 o'clock, old style, which is two hours after the sun is scheduled to rise in the almanacs published by kidney-remedy companies from information furnished by the United States Government in Washington."

"For instance, who is it, when Mr. Hoover wants to save millions of bushels of wheat by using whole-wheat bread, that says whole-wheat bread irritates the lining from the elementary canal? The ignorant man? Oser! He don't know the elementary canal from the Panama Canal, and if he did he couldn't tell you whether elementary canals came lined with satin or mohair or just plain unlined with the seams felled. Then, again, who is it that when any order is made by the Government which is meant to help along the war takes it like a personal insult direct from Mr. Wilson? The ignorant man? No; Mawruss, it's the feller which thinks that what's the use of having an education if you couldn't seize every opportunity of putting up an argument and using all the long words you've got in your system."

There you are. I regret the necessity of pointing the moral and adorning the tale of such ineffable trash as has disgraced the annals of Federal legislation in the last 18 months by reading from such eminent authority, but I regard that as having more of the philosophy of common sense in it than all these statutes that have made Congress a laughingstock to the philosopher and a reproach to the statesman! Still we have had it, and we are threatened with more of it.

It is said that there is no price-fixing power outside of wheat. It is true that if you turn to the act and look for the specific provision you can not find it. Still it has been urged here, and I think with foundation, that the license provision contains within itself the power to fix prices. The revocation of a license, in substance, puts the licensee out of business. He must, therefore, observe orders that come from the Food Administration or he can not continue. Let me give an illustration.

Out in the Mississippi Valley country, where there is a good deal of surplus grain going to waste, poultry is a staple production. Poultry houses at various convenient points for shipping have established their dressing houses, and there, with a considerable force of hands, they pick and prepare the poultry for shipment to metropolitan centers. First in this same bulletin of public information which I will forbear to turn to and read, because it takes too much time, there is a statement that chicken production can be increased in a great variety of ways; and yet there is not an old housewife on the face of the earth who does not know twice as many ways as are contained in that bulletin. One of them is this:

Keep rats and weasels and thieves away from the chickens and you will increase the production for the market.

Well, that piece of glittering wisdom, this jewel of food information, probably some old lady discovered centuries ago; but it occupies almost a front page in this bulletin of censored information.

Mr. REED. A good watchdog knows that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, certainly. Why, probably Hoover knows it. I do not want to be too optimistic.

Another thing that I discovered by referring to this same wellspring of eternal youth and knowledge is a caution—and, of course, a violation of one of these regulations renders you liable to be fined and incarcerated in some local bastile—against selling young pullets. "Let them mature" is, of course, the inference. The spring chicken is a thing that will not hereafter be known. It does not quite say so, but these inferences that I draw are justified by this same production, which is the joke book of the century. Ben Jonson, when he was drinking ale in the old tavern across from the Temple Inn, never got up anything half as good as this one number alone; and there are some equal to it scattered all along through the months.

Mr. REED. What is this production?

Mr. SHERMAN. The "Official Bulletin," published by a department of the United States Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. REED. I trust the Senator will not speak of that document in that irreverent way. I protest. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I am sorry. I hate to lacerate the Senator's sensibilities, but unless it is a positive breach of the rules I shall insist.

I read, in this jest book of the Government, that we should conserve the pullets; and by necessary inference, I was going to say, you can not kill a chicken until it reaches a boarding-house age. Well, if you want to ship them across to the soldiers, who have good teeth and whose dental bills are paid by the Government, I have no objection; but for the average Senator who has reached mature years, I think we ought to be allowed a little tender meat. I am not much of a meat eater. I am a good deal of a vegetarian. I do not believe in the doctrine of reincarnation; but, if I did, I would want to live in some other country. I would not wish to take chances on being reincarnated into some kind of an edible food animal and live under the Hoover administration, because the good ought to die young.

It is no wonder, Mr. President, that out in the western country, where we can say what we please and still keep out of jail, whether we are in the Senate or not, they are beginning to wear broad smiles every time you speak of the Food Administration. The smile has become chronic. Everybody goes around and says: "Don't you realize that we are at war? Why don't you look sober." Well, they look sober for a little bit, and then they begin to think of Hoover, and everybody gets the smile back again on his face.

An old lady wrote me the other day that she drove through the mud of the corn belt, where you can not drive mules in the spring of the year and keep them on top of earth, over to the neighboring market, and took a number of hens. The poultry dealer said, "We can not buy them." "What is the matter?" "We have an order from the Food Administration not to buy and ship any more hens." "Well, what is the reason?" "It is to conserve the supply of eggs." "But," the old lady said, "these hens are past the egg-laying period." She said, "Can't you make an exception of these hens?" "No"; there was no exception; and she then and there, according to the letter, voiced her opinion of the Food Administration, which I will forbear to repeat, because it would violate the rules of the Senate. Nevertheless, I think she is right about it.

That is another one. These indiscriminating orders, applying to everything, can only be made by those who have the most extensive technical knowledge, who have worked them out in detail, and by long experience are able to apply them justly. Why, everybody knows that every spring every prudent housewife harvests every old hen on the place that has reached the time when she can go to the city and be sold to a boarding-house keeper at a profit. They sort them out, and everyone that is capable of producing a potential omelet is kept as a producer. But there is no exception in this order.

I got a letter from the same neighborhood—it is a very great poultry country—saying that they had been informed by a dealer that just as soon as the hen order, as they called it, had been exhausted or had been revoked there would be an egg order; and I notice symptoms of that, because there will be no egg rolling at the White House this year. That is to conserve the supply of eggs. I do not know how the children will fare on Easter Monday. It is possible that an order will issue from the Food Administration that no eggs shall be colored. We have not much coloring matter anyhow, since Germany shut down on the supply, and we have not learned to make it ourselves, so probably we will not lose much amusement there; but I am waiting with interest to know what will be done in the subject matter. At any rate as soon as this shall have been accomplished and the full laying capacity of the eggs shall have been attained an order will go out that eggs shall not be eaten except on Monday. We will have six eggless days and one day on which we can take eggnog, if we live in the right kind of an area.

"Why is this?" I inquire. They say: "It is to furnish the basis for a large supply of spring chickens." They are afraid that we are going to run out of hatching stock. If these wise men knew anything about it, they would know that there are, roughly speaking, one hundred times as many eggs in the United States as there are chickens hatched every spring. There are ninety and nine that we can use in our food supply for every spring chicken produced. So we need not worry about that. If they want to stimulate the keepers of cold-storage warehouses to put the egg in cold storage, so as to keep it to ship to the allies, possibly there may be some food conservation in it; but I have very largely graduated from cold-storage eggs. I do not care for them myself. If they are to be more matured, I prefer to wait until they are fully hatched before I become the ultimate consumer.

There is no food value in a cold-storage egg after a certain time. It will stay down, it is true; but when it is assimilated into your system there is not much nutriment in it. That is what I was getting at. That is what the chemists tell us. Nobody would make such an order that has, in the glimmering abyss of the deepness of the most benighted understanding, one scintillating ray of common sense applied to the production of either meats or breadstuffs. It reaches the limit, and the fact that people will stand it is an indication of the very great depth of our patriotism.

The same Food Administration—I referred to it when the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] had the floor—had a notion that the price of milk was too high. Well, everybody that buys food in the city thinks things are too high. So they approached the authorities on the question. They had numerous conferences. They tried to adjust the matter by compromise and failed.

They finally fixed the price to the producer of milk in the territory tributary to Chicago, outside of Wisconsin—the territory affected being wholly within the State of Illinois—at $3.10 per hundred pounds. This would enable the distributors of milk to sell it to the consumer in Chicago at a given price. The Food Administration fixed the margin of profit to the milk producer as well as the handler. When, however, the farmer figured out the value of his land, the value of his herd of dairy cows, his buildings, his equipment, hired help, trouble in taking care of them, and the production of the milk generally, he found out that at the price fixed he was losing money, and that the more hundreds of pounds of milk he sold the poorer he was growing. The result was what I referred to in the time of the Senator from New York. In the counties of Lake, of McHenry, of Kane, of Grundy, of Kendall, of Boone, of Will, and of Dupage—those surrounding or adjacent to the county of Cook, in which Chicago is situated—the farmers to-day are shipping their cattle to the stockyards. They are in ordinarily good condition. They do not require much grain feeding. The result is the farmer to-day will turn his farm, not to milk producing, but to producing either corn or barley or rye or oats. As a rule, the counties I have described in this area are not distinctively wheat-producing counties. Therefore that supply of milk is gone. It is gone irrevocably for this war period. It is gone so that it will take some time to replace it. Some of these cows that were sent away were blooded. Ordinarily they were the Holstein cows. It will take some time to renew these herds. The result will be that people in Chicago will be paying more for their milk than they would have paid if they had not appealed to the Food Administrator to fix the price. In other words, where they fix it at a price below that at which it can be produced, as the Senator from New York argued with his illustration, it produces, not the article, but the lack of the article. It cuts down the supply that can be furnished on the market.

I want to refer to some other matters.

When steel was lowered in price, compare the production of steel in the United States with the year preceding that of the price fixing, and you will find that there was less iron and steel produced in the United States under the lowered prices and the lowered margin of profit, or sometimes no profit at all. One large company, it is true, shows a great profit on its common and preferred stock; but the prices of the multitude of subsidiary or smaller companies that buy their raw material, their sheet steel for agricultural implements, their rods for wire making, their pig iron and steel for a thousand and one articles of iron and steel, were fixed below what would be an inducement to a man to engage in the business, and naturally the production fell off.

Copper fell off the same way for the same reason, and it fell off sharply at a critical time. The price of wheat was fixed. Its production fell off following the same invariable law. The price for coal was fixed. I will not stop to sketch that, although I have kept the data in my memorandum, because the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] treated that very lucidly, making it unnecessary to cover that ground. To-day he himself read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the regulation under which we will be permitted to have coal the coming summer. I venture this statement: I believe I know that the person who drew up the coal memorandum offered by the Senator from Massachusetts in his remarks a while ago had no actual knowledge of conditions in the soft-coal producing areas. It is based upon the densest and I fear the most illimitable and hopeless ignorance of the situation.

In a great part of the coal belt, employing 100,000 miners in a single State, the State of Illinois, coal is found everywhere. There is but an infinitesimal part of it developed at this time. The veins run all the way from 2 feet 8 inches to 14 feet in thickness. There must be varying prices fixed at the pit mouth for coal.

The thin veins of coal naturally can not be produced as cheaply as that from the thicker veins. A miner drills for the shot. If it is a heavy vein you can shake down in a single shot tons of coal, where it will shake down a very little compared with the former in a thin vein. You may make a shallow drill, and you can only shake out so much because of the 2 foot 8 inch vein. If you put in a heavy shot you will blow the mine up, but with a 10, 12, or 14 foot vein the same shot, practically with but little additional work, will shake down tons of it.

Still there was not at first any proper regulation on this matter. They found it by experience, it is true, but any novice can find out anything by experience. Government is a sober matter, not a series of experimental affairs making every Federal office an experiment station where all kinds of half-baked theories are applied by men who know nothing about it.

Where are the coal men in the offices that fixed these prices, promulgated these orders? They were uneeremoniously hustled out. It is just like the shipbuilding. It is only within the last few weeks, upon the suggestion of Senators, that at the head of that committee and influential in its affairs a shipbuilder has been employed and asked by the Government to go to the yard and see about building ships. Before that time everybody under heaven of every other known occupation—politicians, lawyers, professors, lecturers, chautauqua gladiators, and intellectual junk dealers, every known species of men who could perform miracles on the platform and could not describe a circle if you would give them a chance with a chalk line—all these men were found everywhere in the greatest of profusion; but not one solitary shipbuilder was appointed to any office connected with building ships.

The maxim of this administration is that when something is to be done hunt until you find a man who knows nothing about it and then seize him at once as a long-sought friend to fill a long-felt want. When it is done, of course, it is too late to back out until we make the experiment, because possibly he may learn after he gets in. That is the trouble with all of them. They are all learning after they get in. In time of peace I would be willing to pay my share of the bill, but in time of war it is no time to be making experiments with novices and walking budgets of balderdash in the form of theorists who are trying out something they want to experiment with on the body politic. That is the trouble now. So they fixed this price, and naturally got into trouble.

The next thing we found was that the production of coal fell off. It fell off in Colorado; it fell off in Illinois; it fell off in Indiana and in every soft-coal area in the country that I have had knowledge of the production diminished. I do not know whether that is what they wanted or not, but it came at a very unfortunate time. The experiment began last June. They began to fix prices. Who was it? In the first instance, Mr. Peabody, who held no official position, was here in an advisory capacity. Mr. Peabody is a coal man. He has been in the coal business all his life. He is a private citizen. He operates some of the largest coal pits in Illinois, and I think he has some interests over in the State of Indiana. He came here animated by a patriotic purpose, not of selling coal, because he can sell all the coal he can get out; it is his business. He came here foreseeing that when winter came there would be a necessity for a large supply of coal and that the anthracite coal ought to be relieved as far as possible from the burden by taking bituminous coal as a substitute, especially for steam-making purposes. He urged that. They fixed the price of coal on the judgment of Mr. Peabody and his associates, including Secretary Lane. He is not of the political party with which I am affiliated. He is as good a Democrat as ever lived, but that does not prevent him from being a patriotic citizen. He came here and tendered his services. The Government accepted him voluntarily. He started in and with Mr. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, who has some practical knowledge, they fixed the price of coal. What was done? Just like the person who knows how to milk, and some gentleman from the Loop district in Chicago who is out visiting among the rural brethren comes up and twists the cow's tail after the bucket is full, with the result that there is no fresh milk that morning for breakfast. That is what these distinguished gentlemen did after Mr. Peabody and his associates had fixed the price of coal at a reasonable figure. He knew the troubles that were coming. Mr. Peabody could see ahead; so could other coal men see ahead; so could everybody who ever sees anything. Anybody who fills his own coal bin could see ahead. In our latitude, where cold weather comes, we have learned to look for that.

The ant referred to by Solomon in his Proverbs had more sense than the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy when they approached the coal question after Mr. Lane and Mr. Peabody had acted. Who can observe carefully the old homely ditty and not provide for future wants? The Coal Administrator and those associated with him. So the bucket of milk went over with the proclamation sent out by the good Dr. Garfield. He advised the people to wait and they could get coal much cheaper than it had been fixed by these authorities. I have gotten tired of hearing anything from anybody who has "doctor" prefixed to his name unless he is a doctor of divinity or of medicine. We have been doctored to death with the pills and potions mixed up by these pseudo doctors that come along—doctors of nothing but their theories on how people shall be governed in war times. Whom did they ever doctor before? Students. Did they ever deal with the sober affairs of business? No. Did they ever deal with grown men? No. I am suspicious, and have been for some years, of doctors of economics who have dealt with infants and were suddenly thrown into high place and undertook to govern in time either of peace or war the affairs of a hundred million people. It is interesting on paper, but there is a world of difference between the theories in the New Freedom and Congressional Government and the messages I have been reading in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the last five years.

I had no confidence in Dr. Garfield. The one lingering shred of respect I have for Herbert C. Hoover is that nobody yet has dubbed him doctor. It will come in due time, and he will have this additional incubus upon his shoulders to bear before he is out of office. But Dr. Garfield said, "Wait; do not buy your coal."

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is not accurate in his statement. I think a degree was conferred on Mr. Hoover immediately after his importation into the country by some college, I have forgotten which one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can say, generally, that if you let these gentry once start, if they leave anything out it is not their fault, they have forgotten it. I hear what the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] announces with a feeling of sadness. I had earnestly hoped Mr. Hoover might be spared.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORE. The Senator remembers that Dr. Garfield was chairman of the board that fixed the price of wheat last August.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not informed of that.

Mr. GORE. That is a fact, and I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, to further enhance his appreciation of doctors, Dr. Garfield was chairman of the board which fixed the price of wheat and also president of the college, and it must be said to his credit that while he was investigating the price of wheat he made a thorough test to ascertain the effect of black rust and striped rust on Greek roots. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad to have the additional information. It shows the value of these open debates in the Senate. It keeps adding to our stock of knowledge as we go along. I suppose that is what the President meant when he said that cloture ought never to be adopted in the Senate, that the Senate is an open forum and so many things are sifted out here of the hasty and inconsiderate legislation passed by the House that it ought to remain an open forum for all time. The Senator from Oklahoma has given us a fresh application of this wholesome doctrine.

At any rate, people quit buying coal. The miners, when the demand fell off, had nothing to do. The pits shut down. The miners went out and tried to get jobs at husking corn in the corn belt, and caretaking, and so on, but they were out of work. They were out of work at a time when probably by experience we have learned that we will begin to dig our coal, unless somebody is removed from office and some other novices are put in to start afresh. That is the danger.

We have had three changes in the Shipping Board now. The only shipbuilder, Mr. Baker, of Baltimore, who could tell a ship from a tub and had built and operated ships and knew about them, resigned. He took one swift look at the board, saw what was coming, and stood from under. Then another one was appointed. They inherited the incapacity and the indisposition of the previous board. They started some fresh ones of their own, and in a little while the difficulties became so irreconcilable that the head of it resigned, and then another one came. He remained for a brief season, hardly long enough to take a comprehensive survey of the manifold difficulties of the situation, but taking time by the forelock he, too, emulated his predecessor by resigning, and the present board got in. The present board has a grasp of the situation, and, I think, if left alone, they will build ships. They may make some mistakes, but they will build ships. I can pardon mistakes in anybody if he is doing something. The active man always makes mistakes. They can be corrected.

At any rate, we got into the winter. Everybody is familiar with what happened then. The darkies out in my part of the town were carrying their coal home in a gunny bag, a shovelful at a time. The price of empty dry-goods boxes in the northwest part of the city went up 100 per cent. Everything was affected by war prices. We got through it at last. Do we want to repeat it? I hope not. Do we want to repeat our experience on coal by meat and breadstuffs? I hope not. I hope we will not be called upon to do such a thing, because it would be more serious even than a fuel situation. Still we are driving along in a direction where we are likely to do it.

You can persuade men to do things, you can voluntarily make a condition so that a farmer will put his acres in to the best advantage, but I never yet saw anybody who could compel a farmer to do anything unless we were to substitute for our present form of government a pure autocracy. We must substitute a kaiser with the militaristic form of government in this country before you can compel the farmer to do anything. You can persuade him, you can make it attractive, to raise certain crops, to produce certain meat animals, but that is as far as government can go.

Let me tell you why the farmer is not satisfied. Here, under date of February 21, 1918, Bloomington, Ill., are the proceedings of the Illinois Farmers' Institute. They refer to the fixing of the price of milk, which I will omit. They refer to the National Food Administration, in a succeeding paragraph, that last fall announced that—it would do everything possible to maintain a minimum price of $15.50 for this winter's run of hogs and urged farmers as a patriotic duty to increase the meat supply by feeding hogs to heavier weights.

That is the same thing. We may have difficulty in getting any more of Jones's young pig sausage from Fort Atkinson, Wis. I am not advertising that; I am just calling attention to the fact that he may be embarrassed in supplying the public with pig sausage, because here was merely a suggestion, it is true, but back of it came the thunders of the Food Administration and all the terrors of its penal provisions. Hold your hogs until they are of heavier weight. The entire effort seems to be to get everything old and tough, so that you will not or can not eat so much of it.

The Food Administration announced that there was a crying need for fats. Yet, now that these heavy hogs are coming upon the market, the packers are discounting them heavily. The packers are under Government control, and farmers can not help but question the action of the Food Administration in allowing them to take this advantage of the man who put surplus weight on his hogs at heavy expense. Why doesn't the Government take the responsibility publicly?

Following out the request of the Food Administration, I know what the farmers did in the corn belt. There is where the bacon and the hams are raised that will go across the water to the military forces. You have got to get a cornfield and the swine in what the newspaper men call close juxtaposition. If you do not, you lose freight both ways. So inevitably the great corn areas are the places where pork is raised. Acting under the suggestion of the Food Administration, the farmers of that country laid in great supplies and bred great numbers of pigs. They bought stock hogs and prepared to make a record breaking production of pork. You know what happened. That was along about February 14, as I remember the order or the letter that went out:

About a week ago Joseph P. Cotton, chief of the meat division of the Food Administration, sent a letter to a number of hog men and others in which he stated that there was a demand for the withdrawal of the minimum price of $15.50 for hogs and that he felt it would be "perfectly fair" to withdraw such minimum if he thought wise. Mr. Cotton has since decided not to withdraw this minimum price, but the very suggestion that he could dismiss the obligation of the Food Administration to maintain this price with the statement that such action would be "perfectly fair," has appalled farmers and tended still further to shake their faith in the good intentions of the Food Administration.

Some of them following out the suggestion of last fall or early winter bought stock hogs. They used all their own soft corn which has not so great feeding capacity as fully matured grain. They bought corn from elsewhere. They put it into these hogs with the expectation that the order would stand. They were given to understand by Mr. Cotton that he would withdraw the $15.50 per hundred if he saw fit. It was not done, because of the vigorous protests that were made by men who had invested their money on the basis named. But the power of Mr. Cotton, speaking for the food department, is announced to withdraw the minimum at any time he sees fit, coupled with the statement that he thinks it would be perfectly fair to do so. Farmers may be excused in the hog belt if they quit producing hogs and taking the chances on an administration that lacks either the ability or the understanding to keep faith or to keep the agreement they made.

That is what is the matter. That is the reason why hogs are now going up to $18. It is because the probabilities are that for this summer there will not be as many hogs for the June market out in that country as there would be if this statement had not been made.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORE. Has the Senator the statement there? I have not had access to it, and I would like to have him put it in the RECORD or furnish me with a copy of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I will insert it in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT.

Resolutions adopted at the Twenty-third Annual Meeting of the Illinois Farmers' Institute, Bloomington, Ill., February 19, 20, 21, 1918, wired to President Wilson.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., February 21, 1918.

To the Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

Members of the Illinois Farmers' Institute, representing more than 200,000 farmers in Illinois, at its twenty-third annual meeting held at Bloomington, Ill., to-day adopted the following resolutions and respectfully ask your earnest consideration of same:

"Whereas the food situation is so serious as to threaten a national crisis; and

"Whereas unless the Government adopts at once a strong and unequivocal agricultural policy nothing but a season much more favorable than normal can prevent a food shortage bordering on famine: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we call the attention of the President of the United States to the following facts:

"1. The attitude of the Food Administration is tending to shake the confidence of farmers in its good faith, and is seriously affecting the morale of our agricultural population.

"2. The food administrator of Illinois signed a written agreement to fix a price for milk, through a commission, which would give producers cost of production plus a reasonable profit. The commission appointed by the Food Administration did not consider cost of production in fixing the price. It set a price for the producers that is sending thousands of good dairy cows to the stockyards and threatening the dairy industry of northern Illinois with ruin. The State food administrator has refused to overrule this action of the commission, thus repudiating his agreement to fix a price that would give the producers cost of production plus a reasonable profit. The National Food Administration has so far failed to overrule the action of the Illinois food administrator.

3. The National Food Administration last fall announced that it would do everything possible to maintain a minimum price of $15.50 for this winter's run of hogs, and urged farmers as a patriotic duty to increase the meat supply by feeding hogs to heavier weights. The Food Administration announced that there was a crying need for fats. Yet now that these heavy hogs are coming onto the market the packers are discounting them heavily. The packers are under Government control, and farmers can not help but question the action of the Food Administration in allowing them to take this advantage of the man who put surplus weight on his hogs at heavy expense.

4. About a week ago Joseph P. Cotton, chief of the meat division of the Food Administration, sent a letter to a number of hog men and others, in which he stated that there was a demand for the withdrawal of the minimum price of $15.50 for hogs, and that he felt that it would be "perfectly fair" to withdraw such minimum if he thought wise. Mr. Cotton has since decided not to withdraw this minimum price, but the very suggestion that he could dismiss the obligation of the Food Administration to maintain this price with the statement that such action would be "perfectly fair" has appalled farmers and tended still further to shake their faith in the good intentions of the Food Administration.

Farmers have added greatly to their number of brood sows in response to the appeal of the Food Administration. We now wonder if the Food Administration will consider it "perfectly fair" to withdraw its minimum ratio of 13 to 1 when the pigs begin to come onto the market next fall. The fear that this agreement may be repudiated is already sending many brood sows to the stockyards.

5. Including mutton in the meatless-day regulations has brought loss to a large number of sheep feeders, and we understand that the Government has bought little or no mutton for the Army and Navy or for export.

6. The meatless days have so reduced the demand for prime beef that feeders of such beef have been forced to take heavy losses. The result of this is bound to be felt in greatly curtailed feeding operations next winter, with a consequent meat shortage.

7. In a telegram addressed to this meeting, Mr. Cotton says, "The price of corn is at a fictitious level," and adds, "I hope the price of corn will fall." Such statements do not add to the confidence of the farmer. Mr. Cotton evidently bases his conclusions on the greatly overestimated corn report of the United States Department of Agriculture. The truth is that the greater part of our corn did not mature and that corn that will keep through the summer is so scarce that the problem of the summer's feed supply is a serious one. The price of good corn bids fair to be much higher before the new crop is harvested. Farmers did not make an excessive profit from their corn crop last year in spite of high prices for good corn, since few of them had any corn of the better grades to sell. On many farms the 1917 crop of corn was almost a total loss.

8. The most serious obstacle in the way of producing large crops this year is a lack of skilled labor. The classified draft rules provide a splendid means for raising armies with as little interference as possible with agriculture and the essential industries. When these regulations were adopted we were given to understand that they meant what they said and that they would be administered impartially. We do not ask for exemption from military service, but we did welcome this assurance, that skilled farmers would not be taken from their vitally necessary work until such time as the need for men in the Army is so great as to make such action imperative.

We now find that some of our district boards are not taking these regulations at their face value, but are placing the majority of single farmers of draft age in class 1. Many of these men are farm managers and the production of their farms will suffer materially from their absence.

We are not asking for any special favors, but we do believe that our close association with food production gives us a clear insight into the seriousness of this problem. We realize our full responsibility in the war and are willing to give our strength, our money, and our lives, if necessary, to our country, but a discouraged agriculture can not supply food in the quantity needed to win the war.

Most serious of all is the loss of confidence in the good faith of the Food Administration and the exemption boards. Morale is as important in the army of food producers as among the fighting forces. Morale can not be maintained in the face of vacillating policies that keep food producers in a state of uncertainty. We take the liberty, therefore, to make the following recommendations and to ask that the President of the United States give them his immediate and careful consideration:

(a) That the War Department issue immediate instructions to the district boards to review all agricultural claims for deferred classification and decide them in accordance with the plain intention of the draft classification rules.

(b) That the Food Administration issue immediately a plain and unequivocal statement of its policy toward agriculture; that it show its good faith by fixing a milk price for the Chicago district in accordance with Mr. Wheeler's signed promise; that it give assurance that the minimum ratio of 13 to 1 for the 1918 crop of hogs will be maintained; and that meatless days be enforced with more consideration for their effect on future production.

We feel that the Food Administration is overemphasizing the importance of food saving and overlooking the much greater importance of food production. No amount of saving can make up for a partial failure of the work of production.

We hereby reaffirm our loyalty to our Government in this crisis and pledge the fullest measure of effort to food production during the period of the war. It is only because of the sincerity of our desire to make our efforts fully effective that we ask for the removal, so far as possible, of the obstacles in the way of increased production.

Respectfully submitted.

ILLINOIS FARMERS' INSTITUTE,
H. E. YOUNG, Secretary,
Springfield, Ill.

Mr. SHERMAN. These farmers' institutes are like those held in all the States, I think. They are very generally attended. The people come from all over our State. They represent every occupation—the dairyman, the stockman, the heavy cattle feeder, the grain producer, and the market gardeners—those in the suburbs of Chicago, Peoria, and near St. Louis on the Illinois side. All are represented at those meetings, and these form an intelligent body.

Along with that came the meatless days, including mutton. I think there was a sheepman before the Committee on Agriculture—a Chicago man who knows all about sheep, I think, Mr. Reid. He told of the losses the sheepmen had incurred for the same reason I have given in other matters.

The meatless days have so reduced the demand for prime beef that feeders of such beef have been forced to take heavy losses.

In a telegram produced at this meeting of the Illinois Farmers' Institute, Bloomington, Mr. Cotton said:

The price of corn is at a fictitious level.

And he adds:

I hope the price of corn will fall.

Such statements do not add to the confidence of the farmer. Mr. Cotton evidently bases his conclusions on the greatly overestimated corn report of the United States Agricultural Department. The Department of Agriculture, let me say, reported for 1917 the corn crop at 3,100,000,000 bushels, in round figures. That is an overestimate. First, it makes no allowance for the 18 per cent of frost-bitten corn. In all the great corn-belt areas of the United States there was a premature frost, and by actual computation of average fields that have been husked out it is found that about 18 per cent of it is affected.

Another thing, these estimates made by the traveling agents of the Department of Agriculture, in my judgment, are exaggerated at times. I have a constituent living at Rock Island, Ill., who has several sections of land in the State of Louisiana. He happened to be in Louisiana when the Government inspector came around to figure on one section of corn, 640 acres, in that country. It was estimated at 40 bushels per acre for the whole 640 acres. As a matter of fact, it did not produce, when husked out, 10 bushels to the acre. Let that go for what it is worth and take the figures produced by the department of 3,100,000,000 bushels of corn for 1917.

That would indicate, if Mr. Cotton's views are valuable, that corn is too high. How will you change the price? There is no price fixing on corn in the food act of last August. It will be regulated by the license plan. Every dealer in corn will be licensed. If he sells a bushel of corn beyond what they call their price—and that is where they obtain the power—the license will be revoked.

In the food act, by reading one of the sections, you will find that any unfair practice or unfair profit exposes the licensee to a revocation of the permit to do business. Whenever, therefore, the buyer or handler of corn sells at a price condemned by the Food Administration his license is revoked. The price at which the elevator man—either the local elevator or at the primary interior market of the country—can sell grain fixes the price that he must pay the producer. So the right to license carries with it the right to fix the price at which the licensee can sell it. This statement, therefore, from Mr. Cotton has acted as a damper upon the spirits of the farmer where the great bulk of the corn crop of this country will be grown for 1918.

The farm papers published these proceedings; they published the orders of the Food Administration. Scarcely a farmer can now be found in the country who does not take some farm paper. He therefore informs himself of these orders which are issued from time to time. In addition to that—

The most serious obstacle in the way of producing large crops this year is a lack of skilled labor.

That was written before the order of the Provost Marshal General placing actual farm labor in the deferred classes, which in some measure, at least, will relieve the situation. These reports sent out by the Government about the abundance of farm help are erroneous. There are hands, but they are green material. The skilled farm hand is not to be found in sufficient numbers.

I come now to another matter that I approach with some degree of reluctance. I hold no brief for the packers. They are among the voters of my constituency; they are the object of considerable criticism; they are now under investigation. They have been investigated for some weeks and their papers have been seized under some sections of recent legislation. The packers may be guilty of all or none of the things with which they are charged; I do not know; I shall not at this time or place go into that question. I do not think it is necessary. I only know that I can remember the time in the Mississippi Valley when there was no market for live stock, in the infancy of the stockyards, when the packing houses were mere local enterprises. I can remember when a hog ran from spring until Christmas before any efforts were made to prepare him for the market, and sometimes in those years there was no market. The hog ran out during the whole of the fall of the year on the prairie and in the woodland belt. I can understand why the hog has his peculiar anatomy. Nature made him so in his original state. He was largely nose, because in his original state he was in that happy condition where he had to root to subsist.

The hog, as I can remember, before the days of the stockyards and packers was a primitive type. He was athletic in build and was remarkable for speed rather than for meat. The stockyards grew up; the packing houses came. The hog is a prolific animal. So just as soon as the open market came, and before Mr. Hoover or any of his peculiar theories were ever heard of, the hog became the staple meat-producing animal of the country.

I can yet remember when there was a prejudice against the hog in Europe. We had a minister in one of those countries—I think he was the minister to Denmark, the Hon. Clark E. Carr—and he tried to introduce the hog into polite circles in Europe. He failed for a long time, but eventually he made some headway. He met many obstacles. The people had a prejudice equal to that of the ancient Hebrews and regarded the hog as an unclean animal. The minister argued with them; he showed them about the hog; that when he was given a fair chance the average hog was as cleanly in his habits as a goat, and the goat had from Biblical days been regarded as a clean animal and had been used as a sacrificial atonement on the altars of an ancient race. The minister argued all that out. So, after a while the "melancholy Dane" began to consume pork, and he grew less melancholy from that time, because it was a very nourishing substance. To-day you could not find any Hamlets in that country if you scraped it over with a fine-tooth comb; it helped the Dane and improved him; he got cheaper meat.

Our markets were correspondingly benefited. The export trade began. It began from those small things that I am naming. I only refer to it in that way to fasten it in your memory if I can. Therefore, as the export trade took off the surplus that we did not use of the meat-producing animals of our country, we began to have a fixed market. There is only a tithe of the meat-producing animals taken over on the hoof. The cattle boats do not take many of the export steers; they take practically no hogs on the hoof to European countries; they are all slaughtered here. With the advent of the refrigerator boat, now the best meats of the United States go to the markets of the world as dressed refrigerated meat. Out of this largely grew the present magnitude of the packers' trade.

It is true there are five great packers. It is said that they are a monopoly. Let it be so. Like many other things, I am prepared to accept it as a monopoly and to impose reasonable regulations treating it as a monopoly. Here is one thing the Government has not been fair on; neither has it been acting in that good faith which ought to characterize dealings between men in business affairs. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] read into the RECORD a most startling letter, when you weigh what it means. I sometimes think the general public outside have not yet got the drift of the evidence which the Senator submitted. The packers did not give it willingly; it was taken from their files under a law passed by Congress—or a supposed law. I have my doubts about the validity of such a measure; and if I were again about a court room I should advise clients to fight it, just as the packers' lawyers are advising them to fight the execution of such a law. I think my papers are my own; I think they can not be taken away from me to be used as evidence against me in criminal prosecutions or to expose me to the penal provisions of a statute. Still that is attempted to be done.

I know what the precedents are; I know what the decisions of the courts of our own country are; I know what the decisions are from time immemorial in England, from whom we borrow our rules; whose precedents we have adopted; and whose governmental, and, especially, whose judicial precedents we revere. I can remember of reading when Wilkes was indicted in England for criminal libel for criticizing the administration in his newspaper called the North Briton and his private papers seized under John Doe warrants. Authorities representing the Crown broke into his room, took away his papers, and used them in evidence against him. He sued for trespass; the courts of England sustained his claims; and he collected damages from the trespassers who took his papers away on the ground the taking was illegal. The packers are in that same condition to-day.

It is said that some of the papers are the papers of other people used for the commission of felonies. That is the charge. The courts will settle that and I need not argue it. In due time it will reach that august body of nine men, who are the highest judicial authority in this country, and they will pass upon the validity of such attempted legislation. At any rate, the packers are in the condition where they are now being investigated, using this law as a means of taking from them certain papers found in their files or in the files of Mr. Veder, their general attorney. Frank P. Walsh, in the examination, drew out a letter, which was referred to by the junior Senator from Missouri. The packers did not give it; they did not rush into print when they were attacked; they kept still and bore the grilling of themselves by the incensed cattle raiser and by all the rest of the public interested in the price on the open market.

What was found in this letter? It was a letter—I am quoting now from memory—from Mr. White, who was a representative of Armour & Co. It detailed at some length various matters referring to the packing business. It said, though—and this is the matter to which I especially refer here—that the Food Administration, acting through E. Dana Durand, had told the packers that they must have so many million pounds of beef every week, and doubted the ability of the packers to meet the demand. The packers thought they might be able to produce the meat, after taking stock of the animals in the country that were accessible for slaughtering purposes. I think the Senator from Missouri very felicitously described this gentleman as being worth the money, because he parted his name in the middle, which of itself is not an offense, but like the attachment of "Dr." to a man's name, I look at a man a little more closely who does that than I do if he does not follow such practices. It implies a kind of fastidiousness, so to speak, that would justify a person in looking with care upon the individual, because he has different standards of behavior; and his sense of honor, like that of a good many reformers, is in a rudimentary stage. Sometimes I want a bond with security when such men give me a promise. I am somewhat familiar with them. There are one or two of them in the University of Chicago with whom I have had various controversies, and they lack the sense of honor that goes along with the cheapest kind of a tin-horn poker player in the mountains.

I query if any of you read the election expenses account filed in the city of New York of $1,534,000. Well, when I got through with that, I made up my mind that I did not want campaign expense money and a reformer to get together in anything I am associated with if I wished to preserve my good name. It is a fearsome combination. It is a good deal like an observation made by Gil Blas when Le Sage puts into his hero's mouth the warning: "Never put a reformed drunkard alone in a wine cellar."

Here is what they did—and it is developed in this letter of Mr. Durand that the packers were told to hold down the price of cattle. That is not acting in good faith. The Food Administration, with all the powers of government back of it, went to the packers—the five great houses that will furnish in time of stress meat for our armies, for if you will give them the animals they will give you the dressed beef. They have offered their plants; they have offered to let the Government fix the price of meat and to turn over everything they have got. The Government, with all this advantage, instead of taking this responsibility itself, doing what I regard as inherently cowardly, lacking that fine sense of honor that ought to prevail between men even though they are in public office and a part of the administration's swarm of deputy candle snuffers, apologizing for anything and everything that comes from that administration—even granting all that to be so, why should they depart from that decent sense of honor which belongs to men in business affairs? They know the criticism that always falls upon the packers. Anybody possessed of anything is in a dangerous condition nowadays; it is only the failures in life that have come to the front. Exit the man who can perform things right! Exit the man who has anything or who knows how! Step up to the head of the line the incompetent, the failures, the shiftless, the shock-heads from everywhere, because you have at last come into your own. So, knowing that, these men deliberately put upon the packers the burden of keeping down the price of cattle. What a cowardly shifting of responsibility! It is that to which Louis F. Swift refers in an advertisement, portions of which I wish to read. The packers could deny that they were responsible for keeping the price of cattle down so that the Government could buy cheaper beef, based on the cost price of cattle on the hoof, but would that get any publicity? No.

I have, I think, stated once before in this presence that if I were to go to-night peaceably to my residence I would get no headlines in the morning; everybody goes home peaceably, or is supposed to do so; but if I go out and beat my fellow man into a state of insensibility and relieve him of his valuables I will have a headline in the morning and great publicity. My behavior along the established lines of good conduct gets me no publicity; it is the unusual which attracts comment. So when the price of cattle was kept down by the packers, acting under pressure from Mr. Durand, of the Food Administration, everybody blamed the packers, and great publicity was given to their alleged improper conduct. It was intimated they ought to be hanged to the lampposts. It was all sensational and made a good headline. I have letters in my office saying that Chicago will have another Haymarket riot, with much more merit in it than that which resulted when Fielden and August Spies threw the shell into the ranks of the policemen many years ago, harking back to that time, saying in substance that mob law would be applied. For what? For a thing that by the unprecedented action of the Food Administration was put upon the packers, because the administration was too cowardly to carry the load itself. In order to get publicity the packers have to insert in the newspapers a paid advertisement, at the usual advertising rates, from New York to Denver. Louis F. Swift, president of Swift & Co., says:

> There is no foundation for the alleged violations of law attributed to our company by agents of the Federal Trade Commission, and I want to say emphatically that Swift & Co. is not a party to any conspiracy to defraud the Government. * * * The Trade Commission attorney has by false inference and misplaced emphasis given to disconnected portions of the correspondence taken from our private files and read into the record a false and sinister meaning, with the plain purpose of creating antagonistic public opinion.

That refers to the Durand letter and to the attempt by the Food Administration to make the packers carry the load in keeping down the price of cattle and incur the hostility and criticism of the general public for the attempt to do so.

Very briefly, now, because I do not care to spend much time on the subject, and others have referred to it in a much more capable way than I can hope to do——

Mr. WATSON. Has the Durand letter been published?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Durand letter was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who, a week or 10 days ago, had occasion to refer to it, not for the purpose that I have used it, but for the purpose of showing that the Food Administration had interfered with the natural level of prices of cattle coming into the Chicago market.

The vice of these attempts to interfere with the natural laws of trade was put in an especially forceful manner by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in his comments some days ago referring in detail to the coal situation. The same question has been referred to to-day by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and I will not attempt to go over the same ground and express my views, for probably they would add nothing to the enlightenment of Senators.

But we have started on this enterprise. It is not the first time that governments, as well as private individuals, have started on some course of conduct which, when started, entails upon them the continued necessity of a repetition of the additional folly on which they embarked.

I had occasion to remark not long ago that I am not responsible for the passage of the food-control bill. I am glad of it. I have taken my share of criticism, and I have no words of repentance.

First, however, we undertook in that measure to fix prices arbitrarily. By inference we undertook that in the case of wheat, and by actual assumption of power the Food Administration is now fixing prices through the license section of the food control act upon a great variety of food products. So we are fairly embarked on the shoreless sea of that experiment. Where it will end, the wisest man can not determine. We can anticipate that, if the war should end happily, we may back out of our difficulties without any material damage, save that involved in the general readjustment of prices and the bankruptcies that follow.

The initial difficulty and error was in undertaking to do by governmental agency what a hundred million people, or all of the active portions of the population engaged in gainful occupations do. Markets are made by multitudes of men and by multitudes of conditions. There is not a more sensitive thing in the world than a market. When the grain exchanges of the country were in operation, before they were substantially put out of business, the market could be observed and note made of the numerous influences that deflected the quotations on the board.

Every time a grain exchange has been mentioned here it has been regarded by some as an unmitigated evil. It is a necessary instrumentality between the producer and the consumer. There is one thing that I think is generally forgotten in the discussion, namely, that from the time grain is sowed in mother earth, and especially from the time it is harvested, it must be owned by somebody. There are in the grain market in ordinary times no derelict property in this country; there is no such thing in the markets of the United States as property without owners. The grain of this country from the time it is produced until it has ended its mission on earth, must be owned and carried by somebody. Who will carry it? Will the producer? In the first instance, being the initial owner, he does carry it. The farmer carries his surplus until he needs to convert it into money. He then has recourse to the nearest available market. He goes to an elevator for the purpose of turning such of his grain into money to meet his immediate needs as he may desire.

When it passes out of his hands it still has an owner. The new owner is the elevator man or the commission man. It leaves the local elevator and goes to the great grain centers, the primary interior markets, and the port cities for the export trade, but in no instance can any of the food grains, roughage, or anything in the shape of property produced on the fields and farms of this country be without an owner. The only question for us to decide is, Who will be the owner to carry it? If the farmer carries it, then there will be no collection of quantities of the product to meet great demands. It is impossible to collect it on the instant. It is only where great elevator facilities are found and where elevators and transportation lines converge at great central points that stand as gateways to the grain commerce of the country that grain may be accumulated in quantities. So the owners, after it leaves the producer, are those who accumulate large quantities and take the risk. The farmer does not take it; the consumer does not; but those who have brought it together in great accumulations carry the risk themselves.

It is said that those who have heretofore carried that risk, who have assumed the ownership of the holdings after the grain leaves the producer or the small elevator are criminals, that they are parasites upon the trade world.

I have heard them described by all kinds of epithets; but if they are put out of business, Mr. President, who will take their place? The Government must. If the Government destroys the so-called middleman, it must furnish a substitute, because the producer of grain in the country and the consumer in the city can not reach each other by direct communication; there must be somebody to equalize, to hold, to carry the risk, to take the fluctuations of the market up and down, to gamble with the markets abroad, with the weather and crop conditions at home, and with the demands of our own people. So the Government must furnish somebody in place of the middleman. That has never yet been done, although it is a problem that may at some time be satisfactorily solved.

The same thing is true in the case of coal. It is proposed by coal regulations or by additional legislation to abolish the coal distributor; that the great jobber in coal shall be put out of business. If he is, then it will be necessary to deal with the consumer of coal from the mouth of the pit, so that he may fill his bins and so that the coal yards of the factories and other plants may be filled. When the Government has undertaken that, it has undertaken a line of private business which, in my judgment, it is incompetent to undertake. But prices are to be fixed in that way. That is the purpose, that prices shall be fixed by destroying the middleman and substituting the Government between the producer and user or consumer of the article. I understand that that is the purpose of all the different measures that are brought in here from time to time.

If that is done, let the Government run the breweries—I am now reaching a point that I intended to make—and become the manufacturer and distributor, because brewing only changes the form of the product between the producer and the consumer. Let the Government go into the beer business.

Now, we are told to eat barley bread and corn bread and rye bread. I notice that rye has been conserved so that now none of it outside of the available stock on hand can be taken into the human system except in solid form. That was undoubtedly a food measure. In England, under date of March 12, 1918, I notice that there was some criticism made of this question. I read from a newspaper item, with the date line, London, Tuesday, March 12:

> Criticism of the continued use of grain for brewing and malting was made in the House of Commons to-day by the Right Hon. Leifchild Jones and others. John R. Clynes, parliamentary secretary of the food-control board, in reply said that having regard, among other considerations, for the food situation and opinion in America, the Government, while maintaining a supply of beer for heavy manual workers, intended to reduce immediately the tonnage to be used for brewing material. One hundred and fifth thousand tons of barley were taken from the brewers and malsters on March 1 and a further 200,000 tons would be saved yearly by restricting the standard of barrelage and using substitutes.
> The brewing materials for 1918–19, Mr. Clynes added, would be equivalent to 512,000 tons of shipping, compared to 1,500,000 tons early in the war.
> In his remarks Mr. Jones declared the drink bill was too heavy a burden for the country in times of war. For 1914, he said, it had totaled $820,000,000; for 1915 it had been $910,000,000, while for 1916 it had grown to $1,020,000,000, and despite appeals for economy it had in 1917 amounted to $1,295,000,000.

While we are saving in this country to send to the markets across the sea they are going on with the brewing business. Of course, they have reduced it some; but here in our own country I take from an advertisement of a brewery the statement that the brewers only used 70,500,488 bushels of grain in the last year, and the distillers a trifle of 39,748,000 bushels, which they claim is less than 2½ per cent of the total cereal production. Then, from another advertisement, I glean this interesting information:

> A single Germany brewery was advertising, as a proof of its importance, that it used 325 tons of coal every day, and appropriated 50,000 cars a year for its deliveries.

Along in the days when we were freezing to death, to be using 325 tons of coal a day in one brewery, and shutting the schoolhouses in Washington and in Chicago because they had not enough coal to warm them for the little tots to come in, makes me think this Food Administration and this Coal Administration are color blind on conservation. It occurs to me that if they want to save the breadstuffs they had just as well stop the malster and the brewer and save some million bushels of barley, mill it into barley flour, and mix it with wheat flour. I have had some bread made out of half-wheat flour and half-barley flour, and it is more palatable than the whole-wheat flour. It is much healthier. It produces less deleterious effects than the finely bolted flour, and we could use it right along very profitably if we wished; but I hear nothing in the way of conservation of that kind. Every time I pass a brewery out in the Mississippi Valley, that I know quite well, the smoke is still going out of its stack. It has been doing that ever since we declared war. It will continue indefinitely unless stopped. I think we are saving this grain at the expense of our own sense of justice in the application of conservation and sending it abroad to those people who themselves are malting liquor as a result of drawing on us for supplies. The President has power to stop this waste. Why does he not do it?

Here is another thing: I am going to close in a few minutes now. I do not wish to take the rest of the evening. You never can get through with these endless subjects, anyhow, when you undertake to interfere with the laws of markets and nature by the puny fiats of human beings in legislative bodies. I never knew it to succeed. I have seen the experiment tried within State areas, and I have seen it fail. I think it is a failure here applied. I have read as far back as I can find anything on the subject, and I never knew it to succeed from the days of Queen Elizabeth, when she laid her hand upon every private enterprise in England. Clear back in the time of Aristotle they tried it, and it was always a failure.

I have read a good deal of Henry George in my time—his Progress and Poverty, his single tax. I have been quite interested in the bulky volumes issued by Carl Marx, who is the father of scientific socialism, so far as there is any science about it. I do not think there is much science about it when you read it all and sum it up. If I were to epitomize it all, I would say that the entire system of socialism is embodied in mistaking the yearnings of one man for the earnings of another.

Henry George in his lifetime had a favorite obsession known as the single tax. I regard a real enthusiastic follower of the single tax as a refined sort of a paranoiac, if I may fall into the terms used by alienists. They get it, and it is like a disease. It runs its progressive course. Sometimes it lasts a lifetime, just like chronic diseases, and they die of something else. Well, often a single taxer has it. He goes along. Apparently he is sane enough on most things. He goes along and transacts business, but he has the disease and usually he keeps it all his life. Economically, there is no use to argue with them. You must simply go along and try to keep other people from catching the same complaint that they have. That is the only use I ever saw of arguing this question publicly.

The single tax is based on the nationalization of land titles. The single tax was not born out on the farm. It was born in the miasma of the great centers of population, from that deluded portion of our people who live in the canyons of office buildings, who do not know that the seasons ever change except when it snows on them in the morning when they are running for a suburban train; from the gentlemen who have no idea where the potato comes from—whether it grows on a tree or whether it is concocted by a French cook in the kitchen of some high-class hotel. These gentlemen, living under those conditions, taking their inspiration from such surroundings, and inhaling sewer gas instead of fresh air most of the time, get a kind of lopsided view of life. They embrace the single tax. They see an office building 20 or 30 stories high. The landlord charges them, they think, an outrageous price. They see somebody else with a large business building—a store building—paying an immense sum. The ground rent is an abnormal sum. They look at it. They see somebody die, and his heirs inherit it. They say, "What did he ever do to become the owner of such property?" "The mere accident of birth." "Well, what will we do about it? Single tax it until it is confiscated, until the taxes become so heavy that nobody will pay them; then it will be sold for taxes and the Government will take it."

That idea was born amid such artificial surroundings. It is the product of the cities—not of the country, where there is room enough for men still to regard their fellow beings as associates, where there is a reasonable amount of sunshine and fresh air, and enough to eat. But from there it has spread. It has become a sort of fad. People urge upon me the single tax, and the nationalization of land titles, and then the leasing out by the Government. They say that the Government was originally the source of all title, and let the Government resume its ownership. "What good would it do?" you ask them. "Well, then, everybody can lease on fair terms." Sometimes, having nothing better to do, I have pursued the ramifications of this thing into practice, and asked them, "Who would make the leases?" "The Government." "Who is the Government?" "Well, the ones that are in authority on such questions." I say: "How will they get in authority? Are they going to be kings?" "No; we will have a free government." The single tax always presupposes that it is to be a free government. "Well, then, we will have elections, will we?" "Yes." "Well, then, if I do not like the lease that I get from the fellow in authority, I shall put up another ticket and run against him to get a better lease. How will you keep it out of politics? The country being free, political parties necessarily form, and you get into trouble right away."

I do not want anybody telling me where I have to live. I want to fight that out with my landlord. I do not want to have to go through a campaign on a question of that kind. A campaign has enough troubles now, without injecting the question of landlordism into it.

At any rate, the single taxers attempt to nationalize all the titles. It is said to relieve labor. It is a delusion. When that is done there will not be any private ownership of land in the city or outside of the city. The farms will all be owned by the Government and leased out, and a fellow can have just as much as he can work and no more. The universal landlord, according to their theory, will prevent any of these troubles that we have now under the system of private ownership. No one can be kept tilling the soil under such conditions unless he is driven by force.

You may wonder what that has to do with this bill. I will show you. We nationalize the titles. What will become of the farmer? He will be a mere tenant. He will not own anything, but will be a tenant. Prices will be fixed under these bills, as a means to making the farmer acquiesce in the program. There is not a single taxer that I have talked to who does not welcome price fixing; and I stir them up once in a while to see them perform. There is a kind of a comedy about it. There is the cap and bells and the philosopher and the clown, the comedy and the tragedy of life, that manifests itself. Just stir up these fellows, and ask them to tell you what is going to happen, and you will find that they welcome price fixing. They say, "Wait until we get power, and we will fix the price"; and they all live in a city. We grangers will raise the food and they will eat it at their own prices. "We will fix the price so that the ultimate consumer will not be robbed, as he is now. There will not be any middlemen, and the producer will have to sell at a fair price."

Nearly all of these gentlemen that I know about live in the cities. I never yet talked to a farmer that was a single taxer—not even a tenant. In the city they propose, therefore, to take over these titles, nationalize them by the simple process of price fixing on grain and food products until a farmer can not make a living and must let it pass to the Government.

It was suggested to me by a friend that that was a very philosophical way to go at it, and that it was exactly the same way that certain elements in this country had proceeded to harass the railroads until some of the principal railroad men in the country are willing to let go, and let the Government take the railroads and run them, and see if they can do any better than private ownership has done. They will not; but if you take off the strait-jacket that has been built around them by 25 years of repressive legislation, you will find that private ownership will outdistance any Government ownership of the steam railroads. In other words, I see a part in the same program of price fixing by the single-taxer, by those who have ulterior purposes. They want to extend it to everything that comes off the farm, they want to institute price fixing on food products until a farmer can no longer make a living, and he will let his land go under the nationalization of land titles, cease to be the owner, and follow suit with the railroads of the country as a part of the socialistic program to reach the goal desired by those gentlemen.

Price fixing is essentially unsound. I shall vote, however, to suspend the rules if necessary, and vote for the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], not because I believe in it, but because we are embarked upon it, and having gone halfway we must go the whole of the way or suffer disaster. That disaster is the diminished production of necessary foodstuffs; and you can not make a farmer produce unless he wants to.

King John I tried to make farmers do something. Those who assembled in June, 1215, at Runnymede, were called barons; but if you will look them up, you will find that in those days every baron who helped write the Great Charter of England was nobody but an old farmer that had some land in England and would not be robbed, and he had courage enough to take up arms against the King. A Catholic priest, Stephen Langton, wrote the Great Charter in Latin. The farmers of today are equally independent. You can not force them to do these things; and now, even though in time of war, if you send out an official inspector from the Food Administration and undertake to order a farmer what to do, inspect his kitchen and his grain bin and begin to tell him what he must farm and how he must farm, I predict that it will be an ignominious and humiliating failure for the Government that undertakes to do it in this country.

I wish now, before concluding, to send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD the advertisement of L. F. Swift, president of Swift & Co., to which I referred, and, from the department on finance of the New York Tribune—I have not the date, but some time in March, 1918—some comments by the financial writer on price fixing.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 18, 1918.]

TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

There is no foundation for the alleged violations of law attributed to our company by agents of the Federal Trade Commission, and I want to say emphatically that Swift & Co. is not a party to any conspiracy to defraud the Government. Nor has Swift & Co. been guilty of improperly storing foods or of making false entries or reports.

Conferences of packers, where prices have been discussed, have been held at the urgent request and in the presence of representatives of either the Food Administration or the Council of National Defense. And yet the packers have been accused of committing a felony by acting in collusion on Government bids.

We have done our best, with other packers, large and small, to comply with the directions of the United States Food Administration in all particulars, including the furnishing of food supplies for the United States Army and Navy and the allies, now being handled through the Food Administration.

We will continue to do our utmost, under Government direction, to increase our production and assist the Food Administration. We consider that the opportunity to cooperate whole-heartedly and to our fullest powers with this branch of the Government is our plain and most pressing duty.

The Trade Commission attorney has, by false inference and misplaced emphasis, given to disconnected portions of the correspondence taken from our private files and read into the record a false and sinister meaning, with the plain purpose of creating antagonistic public opinion.

The services of the packers of the United States are most urgently needed, and I regret exceedingly that we should at this time have to spend our efforts in defending ourselves against unfounded, unproved, and unfair assertions, such as are being daily made public.

L. F. SWIFT,
President Swift & Co., United States of America.

FINANCE.

The price-fixing debate is soon to be renewed in Congress. According to Washington dispatches, the President believes that a situation has arisen which requires "immediate legislation delegating to him necessary despotic powers" over prices. Just what makes such action imperative is not disclosed, but it is to be presumed that the administration, alarmed at the sustained rise in the cost of living, is planning an attempt to override the law of supply and demand in relation to many commodities which so far have been allowed to take a natural course. It is a dangerous proposal, unless the administration is willing to undertake the impossible and fix a price for labor, the most important commodity of all. Without control prices are certain to go on rising until, as has been predicted by one economist, they are perhaps 100 per cent above the present level. That is the inevitable result of the great expansion of bank credits, against which the Reserve Board yesterday gave what is likely to prove a futile warning. The price for copper was fixed last fall, and the copper production fell off sharply. The price for steel was fixed, and the steel output in 1917 decreased in spite of expanding demands. The price for wheat was fixed, and the acreage sown to winter wheat fell far short of the figure that had been set by the Department of Agriculture as the acreage which should have been planted.

The price for coal was fixed, and the output of some mines promptly declined. In each case other circumstances helped to restrict operations, but there is no doubt that price fixing exerted an unfavorable influence on activities of producers in all of them. If the price of wheat had been, say, $3.50 last fall—and, uncontrolled, it might easily have reached that price—instead of $2 named for the 1918 crop, does anyone doubt that a much larger acreage would have been harvested next summer? The farmer would have planted more, because he could have afforded the increased labor cost with the prospect of huge profits which would have accrued if the price had not been fixed. What is imperative, regardless of price, is the maximum output of wheat and all other things which are vitally needed for war. Fixing prices, while pursuing a policy of war finance that constantly depreciates the purchasing power of the dollar, will lead to heavy curtailment of output in the end. As it is, there is almost sure to be a shortage of some essentials because of the shutdown enforced under the fuel order. Why aggravate the situation by removing the chief incentive to greater production? The Government has in the excess-profits tax law an instrument which effectually limits the profits of industry and at the same time, if not made too drastic, tends to stimulate productivity. It should rely on that instrument and others at its command to prevent profiteering, which is about all it can hope to do with any degree of success.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 21, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy Spirit, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, descend copiously upon these, Thy servants, that they may go forward to the duties and responsibilities of the new day with patriotic zeal and fervor; that the interests of our Republic may be upheld, sustained, and furthered by their devoted efforts, in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a patriotic address delivered by Hon. Ruffin G. Pleasant, governor of Louisiana, on the occasion of the visit of the descendants of Gen. de Polignac to that State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a historical address delivered by Gov. Pleasant, of Louisiana. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I desire to couple with that a request that I likewise be permitted to extend my remarks upon the question of the rule as to censorship in the case of casualties.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, can not every tub stand on its own bottom? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is a philosophical matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall have to object. The leader upon that side objected to my extending remarks, which were largely my own remarks.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I obtained the consent of the official censor on the other side, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. There is another censor in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects unless he is permitted to print some remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan does not object to the extension of his own remarks?

Mr. CRAMTON. Not if mine are included in the request.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Michigan did object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from Michigan that I did not object. I asked him to withhold his request until to-day, and he said he would not do it. I wanted to look into it and see what it was, as I have been engaged in the consideration of this corporation bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. I stated to the gentleman that it was in part my own remarks in which I desired to incorporate some other matters which I could not prepare.

Mr. KITCHIN. I simply asked the gentleman to withhold it, and the gentleman said he would not do it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not know by what right the gentleman needs to investigate remarks which I desire to put in the RECORD.

A MEMBER. The regular order!

PROFITEERING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is a gentleman in Washington by the name of Guy S. Zepp, who has been communicating with different Members of the House——

Mr. GILLETT. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, as I was just saying, there is a gentleman in the District of Columbia, by the name of Guy S. Zepp, who has been circularizing the House relative to the antiprofiteering bill. Also he has had a couple of communications in the local newspapers suggesting the best way by which the subject could be handled. He is represented in the headlines of the local papers as a "contractor," without suggestion that he is a landlord, too, and he is presumed to offer these suggestions from a disinterested standpoint. As to whether he does so or not, I wish to read a letter which I have just received relative to the gentleman. It is dated Washington, March 16, 1918, and is as follows:

FEDERAL SERVICE INSTITUTE,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1918.

Representative JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: It may be of interest to you to know that the author of the inclosed clipping, taken from Washington Sunday Post, Mr. Guy Zepp, is one of the would-be profiteers of the District, judging him from his acts rather than from his writing. For three years I had been his tenant, paying him promptly a monthly rental of $40 for a seven-room house that had stood vacant for several months. One week before last Christmas I received a 30-day notice to vacate, notwithstanding the fact that he knew that my mother, an invalid 76 years of age, was in no condition to be moved in the dead of the coldest winter Washington has known for many years. On demanding an explanation, he told me he expected to get $140 per month for the house and could not allow sentiment to keep him out of that extra money.

Should such as he be allowed to block the worthy bill now before the Senate and known as the Johnson profiteering bill? I trust not.

Thanks for your efforts, and God grant that it may be passed.

Very sincerely,

REV. JAS. H. DE PUE,
One of the victims.

The clipping inclosed is as follows:

ADULTS IN HOUSE BASIS FOR RENT—WILL SIMPLIFY JOHNSON BILL AND STOP PROFITEERING, SAYS G. S. ZEPP.

In a letter to the Post, Guy S. Zepp, contractor and builder, has suggested two amendments to the Johnson antiprofiteering rent bill which he thinks would simplify the measure and make it much easier of enforcement. He further believes the measure so amended would catch the guilty persons, while the bill as it stands will not.

Mr. Zepp suggests that the maximum rent for a house be reckoned on the number of persons it will accommodate, $10 to each adult person. He counts six persons to an ordinary six-room house and places the rental for it at $60, which he thinks is not too much.

He suggests that for furnished rooms, houses, or apartments the rent be based upon the number of persons that may be comfortably housed therein. He suggests $12.50 a month for each room, allowing two persons to the room. Mr. Zepp thinks that with such a rental most furnished rooms would be rented to one person only, with attendant less wear upon furnishings and greater comfort to the renter.

Mr. Zepp claims for his plan simplicity of enforcement without the great array of legal and clerical force that will be made necessary by the Johnson bill.

In an interview in the Washington Star of the 18th instant Mr. Zepp is quoted as saying that if the bill which has come to bear my name should become law it would "dehouse" many people. I can answer and say that if the bill should not become law and Mr. Zepp and his like are left unrestrained by law, he and they will do the "dehousing," and it will not be done in even a mistaken effort to help the country, but instead out of greed for excessive rentals.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ASWELL, indefinitely, on account of personal sickness; and

To Mr. SANDERS of Indiana (at the request of Mr. PURNELL), for two days, on account of illness.

INDUSTRIAL CREDITS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10608, the war-finance corporation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10608.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order. This bill is a very important bill and I think it ought to have a quorum present, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have a quorum here in committee.

Mr. HAYES. But we ought to have the membership of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes the point that no quorum is present, and evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 339, not voting 92, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10608, with Mr. FLOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10608, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10608) to provide further for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 8, line 24, after the word "funds" insert the words "upon reasonable terms."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that if he does not desire to discuss the amendment the committee will accept it. I think it is a very proper amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish to say a few words with reference to the section.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take any time in discussing this amendment itself, which has been accepted by the committee and which I think the Members of the House will agree is a very proper amendment and possibly will remove some objections which have been made to section 9. I wish, however, to say a few words with reference to this very important section and endeavor to remove, if I can, the impression that has prevailed among the minds of some of the Members that this is a sort of wildcat provision with great danger for large inflation. In the first place I want to disabuse the minds of Members of the House who have got the impression that the bonds of this corporation can be used as a basis for the issuance of currency by the Federal reserve banks. That impression is entirely erroneous. A member bank may issue its note for 15 days, and that short-time note, with these bonds as collateral, may obtain currency from the Federal reserve bank, and the short-time note may be used as a base for the issue of currency; or the member banks themselves may use the 90-day notes of their customers secured by these bonds, take them to the Federal reserve bank, have them discounted, and such notes may be used as a basis for currency.

Mr. LITTLE. They can do that now.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I desire to hurry along, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAYES. Is not that substantially, of course, through one more avenue, but substantially just what the gentleman says the bill does not allow to be done?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The difference is this, if the gentleman pleases, that this is all short-time paper.

Mr. HAYES. Surely.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That can not be kept there. It comes under the provisions in reference to the workings of the Federal reserve bank now as it stands to-day. It makes no more for inflation than the general provisions with reference to the working of the Federal reserve bank——

Mr. HAYES rose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will pardon me. If I yield to all gentlemen who desire to question, it will take up too much time, because I am not really discussing my amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I do not want to annoy the gentleman at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is not annoying me, but I must get along. Otherwise I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Another thing, it provides no more for inflation in that respect than the system which is now practiced by the Federal reserve bank. Now, the inflation I am afraid of, if there is any inflation to be brought about under this bill as to which some concern may be manifested, is the inflation of credit which may result and that would come under any system which would provide for the emergency which is upon us, but the committee has undertaken by the amendments to section 9 to so hedge it about and restrict it as to prevent any undue inflation of credit. In the first place, it differs from the Senate bill because it makes no direct reference to public utilities and railroads, although public utilities and railroads are not especially excluded.

Mr. SWITZER rose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am sorry I can not yield to my friend. I know my time would be wholly taken up by questions if I once start in to yielding generally.

I want to say now, lest I may not have another opportunity, that I do not think that any of this money ought to be used for the railroads, and I can see no reason why any of it could be. We have provided for the railroads by the railroad control bill, so that they will receive the average of the revenue for the three most prosperous years in succession they have ever known as compensation for their rental. We have also provided that the railroads should be returned to their owners in as good condition as when we took them, and we further provided in the same bill that there should be created a necessary reserve and allowance for depreciation. Now, what more is necessary? Some gentlemen may say possibly railroads have some maturities which fall due in one year. What of that? Why should owners of those securities worry about it? They will certainly receive their interest, and a good rate of interest, because the short-time loans run at a good rate of interest. So much for railroads. Now, so far as public utilities are concerned there is perhaps a stronger case in their favor. The rates which the public utilities may charge are low and their expenses are constantly increasing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the gentleman may have five minutes, as I would like to ask him a question. Will the gentleman please explain this phrase, "in exceptional cases," line 18? I would like to hear the gentleman expatiate upon that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is to good a lawyer not to know that no precise definition can be given to the word "exceptional" any more than can be given to the word "reasonable." It will have to be interpreted by the board itself.

Mr. SWITZER. Whoever the Secretary says shall have the money?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not exactly. The board will have to be the final judges, not the Secretary of the Treasury, let me say to the gentleman, because when it comes to that it is not on the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury alone. The Ways and Means Committee struck out the provision that required that these loans would have to have the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it has to be determined by the board, of which the Secretary of the Treasury is a member.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The approval of the Secretary of the Treasury is not provided for at all in this paragraph.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not in this paragraph. It is not necessary for any action taken by the board under this paragraph.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Right on that point, suppose the Secretary of the Treasury should have the right to correct the by-laws. Could not the by-laws be arranged so that the Secretary of the Treasury would have the power and the only power to decide upon these loans?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is assuming by his question—and I think he hardly credits it himself—that the by-laws would override the express provisions of the statute itself which we are enacting. I simply say it would be impossible to have that done. It can not be done, and therefore there is no danger to be apprehended on that line.

Mr. SNYDER. Well, I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, we have inserted in this section 9 the provision that these direct loans should only be made for conducting the business of the United States and only when such person, firm, corporation, or association is unable to obtain funds, with my amendment, upon reasonable terms through banking channels or the general public. We wish to derive all these loans, so far as possible, only eliminating this exceptional case, through the banks. It was our intention and purpose that all of them should be made through the banks where they could be made upon reasonable terms.

The committee will also remember that only one-sixth of the amount of the capital and the outstanding bonds can be used for this purpose. Only about $45,000,000 can be used for direct loans. So that we have no special basis for expansion here. It is idle to talk about there being a demand for $500,000,000 for direct loans, when only $45,000,000 can be obtained by all applicants for that class of loans. With the provisions of this paragraph hedged about as they have been and the notes received thereunder limited as basis of currency to the short-time loans, which can remain in a Federal reserve bank but 15 days when made by a member bank and only 90 when the note of the customer is discounted, it appears to me we have as little fear of inflation as under any method. We will have this danger of inflation, which can not be avoided, if we obtain the credit and use it. I think the committee has thus protected not only the public credit from all danger of inflation so far as we could and maintain the main features of the bill, but we have still reserved to the board sufficient power to protect any concern whose operations are really necessary to the war or contributory thereto, or whose failure or downfall might affect the credits of the Nation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, let us have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I want to oppose it. I am against it.

Mr. KITCHIN. What on? "Upon reasonable terms?"

Mr. HAYES. Yes. I do not think that is desirable at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 45 minutes.

Mr. HAYES. I think the gentleman had better let it go along a little while. There are many important amendments here.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that all debate upon section 9 and all amendments thereto shall close in 45 minutes. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make as to the control of the time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I was going to ask that the control of the time be by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and myself, with the understanding that the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] shall have one-third of the time.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to consume the time of the House unnecessarily, but it seems to me that the most objectionable part of this bill is this section now under consideration.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. HAYES. There should be a discussion so that every Member of the House will understand what it means.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman is going to oppose putting in the words "upon reasonable terms"——

Mr. HAYES. I have only a few words to say in regard to it.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is only a little formal amendment and it looks as if nobody would object to that. I have an amendment here, a committee amendment to this bill, right in that connection. I want to strike out the paragraph, and am going to transfer that over to another. Then the main question will come down to the gentleman's motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will. Now, on that portion, of course, it will require a reasonable time, and that is the main thing I wanted to come to an agreement on.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I have an amendment to perfect the text with regard to public utilities and include them as the Secretary of the Treasury asks to have them. Now, I do not want to be cut off——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there not a committee amendment also yet to be offered?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I said that I gave notice that there was a committee amendment, in regard to the quarterly report, that is to be offered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman agree to an extension of time, to include the discussion of the paragraph and all amendments, to an hour and a half?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would ask the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] if that would be satisfactory?

Mr. HAYES. No; it would not.

Reserving the right to object, I want to say that under the rules of this House speeches should be made first in favor of amendments and then in opposition to them. Those who are opposed to this proposition or any proposition under the rules should have the time.

Mr. GARNER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if you agree to an hour and a half time on this section and all amendments thereto, then each man could get recognition to offer the amendment which he proposes to offer and speak to it, and then it would come up for consideration at the end of the hour and a half.

Mr. STAFFORD. And some Members will come back at the end of an hour and a half who will not understand the amendments, or will not understand the merits of them, and yet they may be important amendments.

Mr. GARNER. That is the fault of the Members.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the fault of the rule the gentleman is advocating.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall be concluded at the end of an hour and a half, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], with the understanding that one-third of the time shall go to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why both members of the committee who are in favor of section 9 should ask for two-thirds of the time when men who are opposed to it should not have half.

Mr. KITCHIN. They will control it. Perhaps they can give some time to those who are opposed.

Mr. MEEKER. Why not divide the time between the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from California?

Mr. GILLETT. Why would it not be well, first, to dispose of the minor amendments and see how much time they will take, and then proceed on the question of striking out. They might take a half an hour on the minor amendments, or an hour even.

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that, so far as the men are concerned that I know about, I think that on the vote on section 9 will depend largely the vote for and against the bill with a large percentage of the men here.

Mr. HAYES. Practically all of them.

Mr. MEEKER. I think we should have that opportunity for even the members of the committee to so state their position as to justify men who want to vote with the committee, but who can not now vote with it with that section in the bill.

Mr. KING. Regular order!

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and the regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has said—and I do not care to go into any discussion of it—it seems to me that to pass the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa means that the Congress of the United States is incorporating this proposition in order to control the rate of interest. I prefer to leave it to the board of directors of the corporation and to the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the financial conditions as they arise from time to time, and if the time comes when excessive rates of interest are generally charged all over the United States and the action of this corporation could affect it, they may, without this amendment, under such by-laws as the board may pass—and when approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in whom I have confidence do such things at that time as necessity requires, and do them much more wisely, it seems to me, than we at this time can do them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that it is one of the purposes of the bill to control the rates of interest and prevent the shylocks of finance from holding up people in the manner in which it has been done. Mr. Warburg or the Secretary of the Treasury in a hearing stated that they hoped to stabilize the rate of interest.

Mr. HAYES. I have no doubt that would be done under any Secretary of the Treasury or under any Federal Reserve Board, or under any board of this corporation. I believe it better to leave it largely in the discretion of these gentlemen, and not to undertake to tie them up too tight with conditions and provisions that they can not get around without violating or disobeying the law of Congress. It seems to me it would be better to leave the bill without the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the pending bill for one reason, among others, which occurred to me when I first heard that this legislation had been proposed and recalled the testimony given a few years ago by some of the most eminent financiers of the United States before a Committee of the House during the so-called "Money Trust" investigation. I remember having heard George F. Baker, the president of the First National Bank of New York City, testify when Mr. Untermyer questioned him. I have not been able to find a copy of all the testimony, but I recall that, in substance, Mr. Untermyer said: "Mr. Baker, is it not true that the First National of New York and the National City Bank of New York, and J. P. Morgan & Co., and Lee, Higginson & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co."—I think that he named one other, possibly two—"are so linked together in the financial world and so control the credits of the country that no corporation or business which involves a capitalization or getting together of $10,000,000 or more can go ahead without your consent?" And after some considerable hesitancy, as I recall his manner, Mr. Baker admitted that that was true. I think that one of the other banks was either the Bankers' Trust Co. or the Guaranty Trust Co., of New York; I have forgotten which.

In this connection I desire to direct the attention of gentlemen to some of the testimony given during that investigation by a very eminent western banker, Mr. George Reynolds, the president of the great Continental and Commercial National Bank, of Chicago, which is, I believe, the second bank in size in the United States; at least it was at the time this testimony was given. Its deposits, as I recollect, are more than $300,000,000. Mr. Reynolds, after his attention had been called to the fact that these great New York and Boston institutions practically controlled business credits in the United States, was questioned, and here is an excerpt from his testimony as set forth in the committee's official report to the House:

Q. I suppose, Mr. Reynolds, that, as president of a great bank, you have kept in touch with the very recent trend toward concentration and control of money and credit in the East?—A. Yes, sir; I have been constantly reminded of it in the last year or so.

Q. You know the extent to which it has gone in the last few years?—A. I have a general knowledge of it; yes, sir.

Q. Do you or not know the effect that has on the marketing of securities of a great railroad and other interstate corporations, and the trend of concentration brought about through the concentration of this money and credit?—A. I have read all that has been adduced at this examination and a great many other things, and my information in detail is very largely the result of this reading, rather than from personal experience.

Q. But you have information and knowledge of the conditions in New York, for instance, as between the great banking houses. That is a matter of personal knowledge?—A. Yes; I have a fairly general knowledge of that, I should say.

Q. What would you say as to that concentration of the control of money and credit being a menace to the country?

I want that particular word "menace" brought to the attention of gentlemen. This great banker was asked:

Q. What would you say as to that concentration of the control of money and credit being a menace to the country?—A. That involves a very deep question. Personally I am inclined to believe it an excess of power of any kind in the hands of a few men might properly be called a menace. I do not mean to say by that that the people who had that control and power have used it improperly. I do not mean to say that at all.

I will pause here to say that the last part of his answer shows his conservatism and caution, qualities necessary because of his relations with these bankers. I read further:

Q. Regardless of the way they have used it for the time being, the question is, is it not, as to the way they can use it?—A. I think a more wide distribution of the power of credit, if that is what you mean, would really be better in the long run.

Q. Taking the present situation as you find it, Mr. Reynolds, what is your judgment as to whether that situation is a menace?—A. I am inclined to think that the concentration, having gone to the extent it has, does constitute a menace. I wish again, however, to qualify that by saying that I do not mean to sit in judgment upon anybody who controls that, because I do not pretend to know whether they have used it fairly or honestly or otherwise.

I will now read from the testimony of Mr. George F. Baker, president of the First National Bank—a Morgan bank—of New York City. I think nobody in the country has outranked him as a financier, unless possibly it was J. P. Morgan himself. Mr. Baker was asked whether this concentration of control over credit had not gone far enough. Here are the questions and answers verbatim, as found in the committee's official report to the House:

Q. I suppose you would see no harm, would you, in having the control of credit, as represented by the control of banks and trust companies, still further concentrated? Do you think that would be dangerous?—A. I think it has gone about far enough.

Q. You think it would be dangerous to go further?—A. It might not be dangerous, but still it has gone about far enough. In good hands I do not see that it would do any harm. If it got into bad hands, it would be very bad.

Q. If it got into bad hands, it would wreck the country?—A. Yes; but I do not believe it could get into bad hands.

Q. You admit that if this concentration, to the point to which it has gone, were by any action to get into bad hands it would wreck the country?—A. I can not imagine such a condition.

Q. I thought you said so.—A. I said it could be bad, but I do not think it would wreck the country. I do not think bad hands could manage it. They could not retain the deposits nor the securities.

Q. I am not speaking of incompetent hands. We are speaking of this concentration which has come about and the power that it brings with it getting into the hands of very ambitious men, perhaps not overscrupulous. You see a peril in that, do you not?—A. Yes.

Q. So that the safety, if you think there is safety in the situation, really lies in the personnel of the men?—A. Very much.

Q. Do you think that is a comfortable situation for a great country to be in?—A. Not entirely.

Coming from such a source, that is most significant testimony.

When I first heard of the introduction of this bill I thought, as I still think, that its purpose was to create a possible competitor to this vastly powerful concentration, in a few great banking institutions in New York, of control over credits in the United States, and I believe that if enacted into law it will accomplish that purpose.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Please let me finish this. I prefer to conclude what I wish to say before answering questions.

Mr. MEEKER. Certainly. I beg your pardon.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is freely granted. I observe, by the way, that the chief officer of the Hog Island corporation is the president of one of the greatest of these New York banks and that other prominent men in that corporation are connected with some of these other banks. Of course, they do not advance the money for that great plant at Hog Island; the Government of the United States does that, but they get that $6,000,000 of profits.

Here is what the House committee, which reported on the mass of testimony, said in 1913:

"Under our system of issuing and distributing corporate securities the investing public does not buy directly from the corporation. The securities travel from the issuing house through middlemen to the investor. It is only the great banks or bankers with access to the mainsprings of the concentrated resources made up of other people's money in the banks, trust companies, and life insurance companies, and with control of the machinery for creating markets and distributing securities, who have had the power to underwrite or guarantee the sale of large-scale security issues. The men who through their control over the funds of our railroad and industrial companies are able to direct where such funds shall be kept, and thus to create these great reservoirs of the people's money, are the ones who are in position to tap those reservoirs for the ventures in which they are interested and to prevent their being tapped for purposes of which they do not approve. The latter is quite as important a factor as the former. It is a controlling consideration in its effect on competition in the railroad and industrial world."

And in my judgment if they should now be left without competition in the loaning of money to companies manufacturing or desiring to manufacture munitions of war, or in any other way to help along the war, they will fix the interest and other charges at their own rate and in their own way, and thus may make it very embarrassing for men who want to organize companies and do manufacturing for the Government for only a legitimate profit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask for three minutes more to finish this testimony.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Said the committee in its report:

"When we consider also in this connection that into these reservoirs of money and credit there flow a large part of the reserves of the banks of the country, that they are also the agents and correspondents of the out-of-town banks in the loaning of their surplus funds in the only public money market of the country, and that a small group of men and their partners and associates have now further strengthened their hold upon the resources of these institutions by acquiring large stock holdings therein, by representation on their boards and through valuable patronage, we begin to realize something of the extent to which this practical and effective domination and control over many of our greatest financial, railroad, and industrial corporations has developed, largely within the past five years, and that it is fraught with peril to the welfare of the country.

"If, therefore, by a 'Money Trust' is meant 'An established and well-defined identity and community of interest between a few leaders of finance which has been created and is held together through stock holdings, interlocking directorates, and other forms of domination over banks, trust companies, railroads, public-service and industrial corporations, and which has resulted in a vast and growing concentration of control of money and credit in the hands of a comparatively few men' your committee, as before stated, has no hesitation in asserting, as the result of its investigation up to this time, that the condition thus described exists in this country to-day."

I take it that it is proposed by this legislation to afford a possible and an effective competitor to the men who now in this country hold a monopolistic control of credits.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if he is aware, in connection with the statement he has made, that this bill is indorsed by practically all the concerns which he has mentioned? Mr. Lamont, of J. P. Morgan & Co., has been speech making all over the country in favor of this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is entirely immaterial. Sometimes good comes from very unexpected sources.

That does not affect the merits of the proposition I have advanced. Here has been a monopolistic control of credits and here is proposed legislation to destroy such control if it still exists by supplying a possible competitor, and also, if that monopolistic control has been destroyed, to help prevent it from coming back during the war and imposing extortionate conditions.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I was going to ask the gentleman a question, but I want to thank him for making the best speech that has been made on the centralization of capital. This bill proposes to put two and a half billion dollars in the hands of four men.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But they are all to be public men, who must conduct their business in public and make a public statement. But the men who exercise this monopolistic control are private gentlemen, who conduct their transactions in secret. I have had some of the best business men in my section of the country tell me of what they have been obliged to undergo at the hands of men who control the country's big credits.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman know of any case in New York where a bank can charge more than 6 per cent interest on loans?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But they loan money outside of New York.

Mr. SNYDER. I am speaking about the New York banks.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They dominate things all over the West. They have dominated credits in the Middle West; they have dominated it in the South. Their loans are not confined to New York State.

Mr. SNYDER. Most of the loans are made in New York.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. I was on the committee that the gentleman refers to, and I want to ask him if he is aware that recent legislation has changed the condition of the surplus funds of the country, and they are no longer piled up in these gentlemen's hands, but they are in 12 Federal reserve banks all over the country? It is entirely different.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I beg the gentleman's pardon—he is a banker and I am not—but I want to remind him that our friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], day before yesterday said that Proctor, Gamble & Co. had been looking around to borrow $25,000,000 and finally succeeded. I asked him where they got it, and he said in New York City. I presume that some of these big banks in New York City, in the aforesaid combination, helped raise the twenty-five million.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask for one minute more. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], to whose speech I referred, has just informed me that they required 7 per cent—a little more than that—from Proctor & Gamble.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and they charged a public-utility corporation that went to New York to obtain money 13½ per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Proctor & Gamble had to pay these New York men 7 per cent and more on twenty-five millions, and I remind the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] that that firm is located, not in New York, but in Cincinnati. Not only that, but it appears that New York financiers held up another corporation and charged it for money 13½ per cent.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to supplement what I said a few minutes ago. Another reason why I think, in a few words, this amendment of the gentleman from Iowa should not prevail is that it opens the door of the Federal Treasury a little wider. It creates another class that can come to the United States and get loan accommodations, and makes it more objectionable to those of us who object to section 9. The bill provides that when these men can not be accommodated in the usual avenues, or if they think that the interest charged them is too high, they can come and secure accommodation at the hands of this corporation, which means at the hands of the United States. That is the reason why I think the amendment should not prevail. Leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury and the board of directors to say whether these men should be accommodated under the bill as it is.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us vote on this little amendment first.

Mr. LITTLE. But I want to say something about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California having spoken twice, does not the vote come automatically?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that all debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I observe that the gentleman from California, who has already spoken once on the amendment, has spoken a second time.

Mr. LITTLE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I moved to strike out the last three words, and the Chair recognized me.

The CHAIRMAN. But all debate has been exhausted on this amendment. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LITTLE. I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. LITTLE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state what it is.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the Chair tell me why I am not in order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that the House is dividing and the gentleman can not do that.

Mr. LITTLE. I have the floor; I have been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LITTLE. Upon what theory am I not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Because debate has been exhausted and the committee is voting on the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. It was not when I rose.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes had it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Green amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 6.

So the Green amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Good: Page 8, line 18, after the word "directly," insert: "(1) to any person, firm, corporation, or association owning or controlling directly or through stock ownership any public utility, and (2)," so that as amended the section would read:

"SEC. 9. The corporation shall be empowered and authorized in exceptional cases to make advances directly (1) to any person, firm, corporation, or association owning or controlling directly or through stock ownership any public utility, and (2) to any person, firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business in the United States," etc.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, sections 7 and 8 of the bill provide for advances of financial aid through the banks. Section 9 of the bill, the section to which I have offered this amendment, provides for direct advances. The amendment which I have offered is the language contained in the bill as it passed the Senate, with the exception that I have eliminated railroads. The Senate bill provides for direct advances to railroads and public utilities. As has been suggested, the railroads are provided for in another bill. The amendment which I have offered applies only to public utilities. I was told not less than a week ago by a gentleman from Chicago that a syndicate there owning a large number of public utilities, having obligations maturing in the near future, had applied to a bonding house to underwrite $30,000,000 of their securities for a period not exceeding five years, and the best rate they could get for underwriting $30,000,000 was $10,000,000 in cash. We are living in rather abnormal times, so far as credit is concerned. If we were not there would be no excuse for this legislation. It is because of the abnormal situation, so far as credit is concerned, that we can support this measure at all. It seems to me that in this section of the bill we ought to provide that the class of bankers to whom the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] referred as waxing fat and growing rich during these times through a manipulation of credit should not be permitted to say to a public utility that it would have to turn over to them one-third of the proceeds of the sale of their bonds and notes as commission for underwriting the transaction.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I did not understand the amount that these brokers or New York bankers demanded. Was it one-third of the entire amount?

Mr. GOOD. It was one-third—$10,000,000 for underwriting the $30,000,000 transaction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will, if I can get some more time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would say to the gentleman that this paragraph includes the right to lend money to public-utility corporations. The Secretary of the Treasury clearly indicated that in his testimony and so did the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Warburg. If I had the time—I do not want to take the gentleman's time—I would read some of that testimony into the RECORD. It is clearly the purpose to cover that.

Mr. GOOD. The bill that came to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House originally prepared by the Treasury Department, I understand, did contain a provision to include public utilities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no; that is not the fact. That provision was inserted in the Senate.

Mr. GOOD. Then I stand corrected in that regard. I so understood it. At any rate, the bill as it passed the Senate contains the exact language of my amendment. I understand that there is some question as to whether or not the bill does include public utilities. If there is any question about that, we ought to put that question at rest. If it includes public utilities, the amendment I have offered will do no harm. If the bill does not extend this privilege to the public utilities, it ought to, and hence there is need for the amendment. I am told that the Secretary of the Treasury desires to include public utilities. He so stated before the committee. I think they ought to be included. I want to say to you that the $10,000,000 that this Chicago syndicate will have to pay to underwrite its bonds, or the commission charged by any concern for financing, will be passed right on to the ultimate consumer, and he will have to pay that charge, be it large or small, in increased rates. It seems to me that public-utility concerns, having invested, in the aggregate, at least $4,000,000,000, is entitled to this consideration and financial aid from the Government. It will cost the Government nothing. It will save some of these concerns from bankruptcy, and will help to keep down the costs to the ultimate consumer. Why not allow these concerns to go direct to this big corporation and ask protection against bankers and bonding concerns who would charge one-third of the total proceeds of a bond issue for underwriting the proposition? There certainly can be no objection to the amendment if it is included within the bill. It is not included in the direct terms of the bill, and what I fear is that some comptroller will hold that without language of that kind, without direct authority to loan directly to such utility, the Secretary of the Treasury will not be allowed to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. There is no doubt that the purpose of this paragraph is to permit a loan in exceptional cases to such corporations as those to which the gentleman from Iowa refers.

Public-utility corporations have been specifically mentioned throughout the hearings as those that might come in for relief due to the fact that their securities are generally long-time securities and that they tie up the liquid assets of the banking corporations with which they have to do business and that they would be embarrassed in the matter of the maturity of their loans. When the Secretary of the Treasury was before the Committee on Ways and Means he was asked specifically as to this matter.

Electrical companies would come within the scope of the activities of the war finance corporation, would they not?

He was asked, and answered:

Oh, yes.

And water-power companies?

Yes.

And public-utility companies generally, including trolley lines?

Yes.

They would all be considered contributory to the war?

The Secretary answered:

I would say directly contributory.

Now, that answers the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, it seems to me. If this bill passes, the Secretary of the Treasury is to be one of the incorporators of this company. It is generally conceded that he knows a great deal about what the purposes of the corporation are, and his answers to specific questions showed clearly it was the intent to relieve these corporations where they could prove up on war grounds.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. McCORMICK. If there be any advantage in incorporating relief to public utilities, how far ought we to go in enumerating the enterprises to which advances may be made?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we enumerated particular kinds of enterprises in this paragraph it might give those particular enterprises an advantage over certain other enterprises that ought to have an equal show on their applications for relief; that is all; and to name public-utility corporations specifically in this paragraph would mean that you would eliminate other companies, certain other business corporations that should have a right to come here for relief if they think they need it.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman now point out any language in this section which would apply to a public utility not furnishing light, power, or other utilities for an industry that was producing something needed for war purposes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will.

Mr. GOOD. Point out the language.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will read section 9:

That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized in exceptional cases to make advances directly to any person—

Now, a person may be an individual or a firm or a corporation—

firm—

That certainly is a little more comprehensive—corporation—

That certainly would include anything in the public line—or association, an established and going business in the United States—

Now, what could be more comprehensive?

Mr. GOOD. Do not stop there; read further:

whose operation shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war.

That is the rest of the sentence.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly. If they are not necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, there is no intent to give them relief, because this is an emergency measure and is for war purposes only.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that his amendment leaves in those words.

Mr. GOOD. No. I modify this, and I provide, just as the Senate did, that the advances should be made directly, first to a public utility, and then, secondly, to any person, firm, or corporation, and so forth. That applies to the latter class and not to a class——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If a corporation can not prove up as having a connection contributory to the war, then it does not come within the scope of this law at all, because there is no intent to help such nonessential corporation. If, for instance, you are going to erect a tourist hotel and put out a lot of bonds, you could not get any relief from this corporation, because you are not helping along in the war. If it is a public-utility company, carrying men back and forth to an industry incident to the war, farmers to the field, men to the factory, then, being a public utility contributory to the war, it is entitled to relief under this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If the construction of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is that loans shall be made to public utilities whose operations are not contributory to the war, then I am absolutely opposed to it. If, however, it is to be construed as I think it should be construed, and as the Senate put it in, it is absolutely unnecessary in this bill. The case cited by the gentleman from Iowa was brought to our attention and discussed. We have no question in the world, no member of the committee has any question, that the specific utility company pointed out is covered in this bill as it is. Now, the only objection to specifying public utilities, as indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is that it might be construed as giving them certain privileges over other concerns to be benefited under this section. It is in a sense an invitation to come to this corporation to get money. Any public utility conducting a useful business which is contributory to the war can receive the benefits of this section without any question.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Just to get some idea as to what might be construed as being contributory to the war, would the gentleman think that an interurban railroad that was hauling grain and coal would come under it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Without any possible question.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Would the gentleman think that a street car company in a city that was carrying workmen back and forth to arsenals or to war industries, or factories engaged in war industries, would be a public utility that would come within the bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably it would come within the bill as it stands at present.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think so, too.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that the amendment is absolutely unnecessary and would simply complicate the bill.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. A street car company that was in an inland city, where there were no factories, but that just carried people back and forth to their places of business and carried persons riding on the street cars for pleasure, would not come within the scope of the bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think that would come within the scope of the bill, and would not be so interpreted by the board.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. Then this amendment might be construed as such things are always construed in statutory construction, that by enumerating certain classes of business the legislative mind is supposed to exclude others.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. HAYES. And if you enumerate the classes of business that are to be included in this bill you exclude everything else?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It at least gives them a privileged status.

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, I do not understand what the gentleman means by saying they are going to take care of a bankrupt concern. There is nothing in the bill to that effect. The reason we allow a concern to borrow money under this section for a period not to exceed five years is that the bonds of the corporations are going to run from one to five years, and when A, the borrower, comes up to the corporation and shows the corporation that on account of the big expenditures he must make and the output he must turn out he will require one year to two years, or three to five years, to meet the loan, the corporation will then issue, if it has not the money, its bonds to this borrowing concern. So that if the borrowing concern needs a loan for five years, the corporation will issue its bonds for five years, and the note of the borrower and the bonds will both mature at the same time. This bill would do no good, I would say to the gentleman from Missouri, and would not accomplish its object at all, if it limited the loans, say, for 90 days or 6 months or even a year.

Mr. SNYDER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. How could a bankrupt concern put up 133 per cent of the loan it desired to make?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is right. I do not see how a bankrupt concern could put up, as the gentleman says, 133 per cent of its securities for its loan.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman the short-time loans can be taken care of by the State banks and by the Federal Reserve System. That is one reason we safeguarded the Federal Reserve System as we do in this bill, namely, so that it can take care of the short-time liquid paper and continue to perform the principal function for which it was established.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to read in his time one statement by the Secretary of the Treasury? It has reference to some Russian bonds that were supposed to have been sold in this country prior to the United States entering the war.

As to this, the Secretary said:

Securities put up with the war finance corporation must have value. It is specifically stated in this bill that the war finance corporation may only lend to a bank, on its indorsement, on securities up to 75 per cent of their value. Suppose the Russian bonds in question were worth only 10 cents on the dollar, then if the war finance corporation determined to help the bank it could only lend 7½ cents on each dollar of value.

In addition, in these exceptional cases, whoever borrows money shall put up 133 per cent collateral.

Mr. KITCHIN. We all know that these war industries have got to expend such large amounts and wait until they get the money for the output, which may be a long time, that it would be impossible for the banking institutions of this country to furnish them money and credit on short-time loans. They must have long-time loans.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I would like to know whether the Federal Reserve System or any of these banks are permitted to buy any of the bonds of this corporation?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Federal reserve banks?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. No. The committee eliminated the provision from the original bill permitting the Federal reserve banks to deal in the bonds of the corporation.

Mr. KREIDER. Can an ordinary national bank buy these bonds and put them up as collateral security?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; it could do that.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the Federal Reserve Banking System accept these bonds as collateral security?

Mr. KITCHIN. The national bank can do it. The State banks can do it. They can buy these bonds and then put them up as security to borrow money. But the Federal reserve bank—that is, the regional bank—can not deal in them or go out and buy them.

Mr. KREIDER. That is not the question. The question is if a member bank, we will say, would buy $100,000 of these bonds, can it put that $100,000 of bonds up as collateral security and borrow money from the Federal reserve bank for a period equal to five years?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly not. The member bank buys $100,000 of these bonds. It can go to the Federal reserve bank and give its note and these bonds as security and get money for 15 days only. That is to protect the Federal Reserve System. Now, if you were to go to the bank in a commercial transaction and have one of these bonds and put up your note to the member bank and the member bank wanted to rediscount that, then it could get the loan for 90 days, because that would be rediscount paper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, there has been an assertion made here several times during this discussion, by very able and learned men, which strikes me as being incorrect, and it seems to me that before we go further we ought to get this thing cleared up. It is a matter of importance at this moment.

We have been told here repeatedly that the charter or the bill that creates this corporation, or some mysterious power about this corporation, makes it impossible for the by-laws to affect the uses of its powers in any serious way. Now, you have only to read this carefully in order to see that that is not correct. On page 5, section 6, it is provided that "this corporation shall be empowered to authorize and amend and repeal by-laws." They can do that.

What kind of by-laws? "By-laws prescribing the powers and duties of its officers and agents." When you have made a by-law that prescribes the power and duties of its officers and agents you have taken it by the throat and told it what it can do. That of itself confutes the theory that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] stated a few moments ago.

Besides that, they make by-laws "to regulate the manner in which the privileges granted to the corporation may be exercised and enjoyed." When you have told a man how he may exercise and enjoy his privileges, you have again taken him by the throat and told him exactly what he shall do.

Further, it says there shall be by-laws "regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted." Why, gentlemen, you have there affected every feature of the legislation that covers this authority. You have told them exactly by the by-laws what shall be done, and I defy any man to name any part of the functions which this corporation can exercise that can not be reached in that way.

It further provides that the by-laws shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. When you have stated that, Mr. Chairman, you have put it in his hands.

Now, I did not rise to uphold or attack this plan. I did not rise to say I could offer a better one. I may be wrong in my view of what the law means. But to my mind, Mr. Chairman, the English language conveys certain fixed ideas, and when you take the words out of the dictionary and put them in a bill you have stated something concrete and definite; and no man can mention anything that they can really do that is not affected and controlled by the by-laws you can make. Either that is correct, or else the English language does not mean anything.

If I am wrong somebody may explain that later. I do not care to enter into a discussion of it, but I simply wanted to get my view of it on this record. Then, my conscience is clear on the subject. But without doubt, if this is what it is said to be——

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, you will not gain time by that method. You will save time by letting me make a statement just as you and others do.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I do not rise with a desire to provoke a controversy with the gentleman, but simply to state the fact that we disposed of this matter yesterday by a vote of the committee.

Mr. LITTLE. No; you have disposed of nothing till the bill is a law. The point I make is pertinent to every clause in the bill and is in order all through the discussion of this bill.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a few questions of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. You want to subject me to cross-examination?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. It rests in the discretion of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SWITZER. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SWITZER. As I understood the chairman of the committee awhile ago, the member banks could give its obligation to the Federal reserve bank and have it discounted. That is true, provided the member bank has not the currency on hand to meet the application for some loan made on it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the liquid commercial paper.

Mr. SWITZER. But if they have, they can not discount it or receive Federal reserve notes upon it.

Mr. KITCHIN. They can not issue any Federal reserve notes on it.

Mr. SWITZER. Yesterday it was stated by a member of the committee that it was not expected to sell these bonds outright, but that likely some concern engaged in war-time work would take these bonds, and I suppose exchange for them its bonds or securities. I suppose that is on the theory that when they once get the bonds of the War Finance Corporation the concern that obtained the bonds could go to the member banks and put up its obligation and attach these bonds and have that discounted; but, as I understand, that can only be done for the term of 15 days.

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not change the Federal reserve act in that respect at all.

Mr. SWITZER. It would be 90 days, then, would it?

Mr. KITCHIN. The direct loan to a member bank from the reserve bank is only for 15 days. That is when the member bank gives its note for the money. When it rediscounts liquid commercial paper it can get it for 90 days. That is called 90-day paper.

Mr. SWITZER. That would be 90 days, and the Federal reserve bank could go to the Federal Reserve Board, if necessary, and obtain Federal reserve notes upon this discount paper.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not unless it puts up 40 per cent gold.

Mr. SWITZER. With the bonds attached.

Mr. KITCHIN. There must be a 40 per cent gold reserve back of Federal reserve notes.

Mr. SWITZER. Suppose they put up the gold.

Mr. KITCHIN. If they put up 40 per cent gold, and if they put up the same kind of liquid commercial paper that they are now required to put up, of course, it could be done.

Mr. SWITZER. If the people do not buy these bonds generally when they are offered for sale, I do not understand——

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield, I think the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] misunderstood the gentleman's question when he said that the borrower would have to put up the gold. The gold must be back of the Federal reserve note.

Mr. SWITZER. I understand that——

Mr. KITCHIN. The Federal reserve note that is issued must have back of it 40 per cent gold.

Mr. FESS. But the borrower does not supply it.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the reserve bank would put up the gold.

Mr. SWITZER. I think I understand the working of the Federal Reserve Board. What I want to get at is this: Is it the theory of this committee that these bonds will be sold and that the War Finance Corporation will actually have the cash on hand to advance to the concern asking for a loan, or is it expected that the concern that wants to borrow money will bring its collateral, or its obligations in the shape of bonds, secured on its own property, to the War Finance Corporation and exchange them——

Mr. KITCHIN. Both ways, as I explained very fully yesterday. If the corporation does not have the money and wants the actual cash, it will then sell its bonds either to the banks or brokers, or on the market, privately to investors, or publicly; and if it does not need the cash it will advance its bonds to the borrowing institution, and then the borrowing institution will either take the bonds and borrow from the banks, with the bonds as securities, or it will go out and sell them and get the money.

Mr. SWITZER. Then the borrowing concern will peddle the bonds around?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; when it takes the bonds.

Mr. HAYES. I move to strike out the last two words, to suggest to the chairman of the committee that I think he did not mean to be understood as stating that under the law a loan upon the direct application of a member bank could not be for to exceed 15 days.

Mr. KITCHIN. Fifteen-day paper.

Mr. HAYES. No; not under this law.

Mr. KITCHIN. Which law?

Mr. HAYES. The law we are proposing, nor under the law as it is to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. HAYES. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is it?

Mr. HAYES. Ninety days.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is the 15-day paper?

Mr. HAYES. That is probably a regulation of the Federal Reserve Board. But the law permits 90 days.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] and to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] that the distinction between the shorter time notes and the longer time notes—that is, the 15-day paper and the 90-day paper—is that the shorter time is for the direct loan to the member bank.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman is correct, I think.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say that the construction placed by the gentleman from North Carolina is the same as the construction placed by Mr. Warburg in his testimony before the committee.

Mr. HAYES. I think I am in error and that the gentleman is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. According to my understanding, all the amendments except the main amendment of the gentleman from California to strike out the section and the committee amendment have been offered, and I ask unanimous consent to offer the committee amendment, which will include two portions of the bill Let me state it, Mr. Chairman. The committee desires to offer an amendment to strike out the paragraph with respect to making quarterly reports on page 9, the paragraph beginning on line 22, down to and including line 3 on page 10 and insert in lieu thereof on page 16, after line 19, the following which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: On page 9, strike out all of the paragraph beginning in line 22, down to and including line 3, on page 10, and insert in lieu thereof, on page 16, after line 19, a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 19. That the corporation shall file quarterly reports with the Secretary of the Senate and with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, stating as of the first day of each month of the quarter just ended, (1) the total amount of capital paid in, (2) the total amount of bonds issued, (3) the total amount of bonds outstanding, (4) the total amount of advances made under each of sections 7, 8, and 9, (5) a list of the classes and amount of securities taken under each of such sections, (6) the total amount of advances outstanding under each of sections 7, 8, and 9, (7) the amount of bonds and obligations of the United States bought or sold under section 11, and (8) such other information as may be hereafter required by either House of Congress.

"The corporation shall make a report to Congress on the first day of each regular session, including a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, how are we to get over to page 16?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the amendment, the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest that the gentleman from North Carolina make a brief explanation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph which I move to strike out in the present draft of the bill requires only reports with reference to advances made under section 9. This is the direct-loan section. The paragraph in the bill requires a report of the name and place of business of each person, firm, corporation, or association receiving advances under section 9, the amount advanced, the terms, and the security accepted therefor. The committee amendment requires a quarterly report with reference to the business of the corporation under sections 7, 8, and 9, and an annual statement of all its receipts and expenditures, but without specifying the names and addresses of the borrowers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman give his reasons for that?

Mr. KITCHIN. I gave them quite fully the other day in my explanation of the bill. I stated why I thought we ought not to specify the names of the borrowers, because it would give their competitors who are getting money through the banks a great advantage. It would give them information of exactly what securities the borrower put up, the amount of his loan, and perhaps the purposes of his loan. We do provide that the House, or the Senate, either, can call for a detailed report at any time it sees fit. If either House thinks that the report is not satisfactory it can by resolution require the corporation to give the names and the addresses of the borrowers and all the details connected with the transactions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out in line 17, page 9, the word "one" and insert the word "two."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 17, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "two."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that the minimum rate of interest, in my opinion, as provided by the bill is altogether too low for this national bank to advance directly to private concerns desiring a long-time loan, in effect the character of a mortgage loan. The current rate of the Federal reserve banks for rediscount of paper is 5 per cent. This would provide a minimum rate of 6 per cent, and, to my way of thinking, it is the easiest thing for any large corporation who may avail itself of this provision to come and ask the Government of the United States through this United States bank for money that will be raised by the taxpayers of this country, and by contributors in the purchase of liberty bonds, for a loan, without limit as to amount, at 6 per cent. Any person who is acquainted in the slightest degree with the current conditions knows that commercial paper is being floated at 1 or 2 per cent higher than the rate charged by the Federal reserve banks. It is difficult to-day for an industrial or commercial establishment, with good backing, to get money at even 7 per cent. But here you propose, on this weak security of but 133 per cent of the face value of bonds, that they shall be privileged to obtain money at 1 per cent—not above the current rate charged by the local banks, but 1 per cent above the rate charged by the Federal reserve banks—yet that rate in the existing commercial banks is to-day 2 per cent higher than that which is charged by the Federal reserve banks.

I think there should be some limit placed upon this, so that this United States bank will not be called upon by every kind of concern to advance money. As I understand this section, the purpose of it only is to give relief to these large corporations when they can not get the necessary loan from the local banks. If you put this rate at only 1 per cent more than the Federal reserve bank rate and keep it at that rate, you are placing a premium upon their first seeking the money from the corporation. They should first make application to the national banks or other banks of their respective communities. This paragraph also permits the corporation to loan them money on security that I contend is less adequate than the commercial banks would require. One hundred and thirty-three per cent is all of the security that will be asked of these large corporations who are seeking loans, whereas if an individual or concern goes to a private bank for a loan it will not be granted unless he furnishes much more than 133 per cent of the value in securities. Certainly in this instance the rate should be raised to 2 per cent more than the rate charged by the Federal reserve banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] to strike out the section.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, in view of the fact that we have taken nearly an hour and a half on these little amendments, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in one hour, one-third of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], one-third by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and one-third by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in one hour, one-third of that time to be controlled by himself, one-third by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and one-third by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, why is it that the opposition to this does not get half the time?

Mr. KITCHIN. Upon the same ground that the opposition to the bill did not get half the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that we shall try to be very liberal so far as the time I control is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I have moved to strike out section 9 because, according to my view, it is the most vicious part of the bill. Aside from the proposition of permitting the Government of the United States to make loans directly to private corporations and individuals, it is vicious for other reasons. Private individuals coming to the Government of the United States and getting loans or asking for loans will not be subjected, can not be subjected, to the same scrutiny by the official who will have that matter in charge as they would if they went to their own bankers to get it. The Government of the United States can not know all of the ins and outs of the individual's business as the banker can who knows him and who has known him for years, who knows his weaknesses and his strength, and all about him and all about his business, and whether he is entitled to consideration or not. For that reason I believe this to be a very dangerous precedent to set.

If under the circumstances laid down in this bill a corporation comes to the United States for assistance it must be because it has not been able to get it through the ordinary channels of trade, and why has it not been able to get it through the ordinary channels of trade? There is always a reason why a man or a corporation can not get credit when it is needed. It is usually either because the man or the officials of the corporation have not conducted the business as prudent men should or because of their character and responsibility or because the business is in such condition as not to be good for the amount of the loan. So it must follow that assistance extended under this provision must be to those who for some reason are in unusual need, who are hard pressed. I have sympathy with the man who needs money and can not get it. I have been in that position myself, but I am not willing that the Treasury of the United States should back up sundry and divers millionaires who are in financial trouble and such trouble that they can not get the money elsewhere. I do not think that is a sound financial proposition. It has been stated in the course of this discussion, and it was stated in the committee, that there are certain corporations here that will have to go into the hands of receivers unless they can get some extraordinary assistance that will not be extended to them by the banks or financial agencies of the country without excessive rates of interest. Very good, suppose they do go into the hands of receivers. That is not always a calamity. When a corporation has been badly managed or overcapitalized, or when its funds have been stolen by those who have had a chance to steal them, sometimes that is the only remedy that can be applied. A reorganization in such a case would be forced and that corporation be obliged to come down to a solid basis. That might be a hardship, but medical remedies while very unpleasant to take are often very effective in curing the disease of the patient. It is not the part of wisdom for the Government of the United States to come to the rescue in such cases and help them out, according to my judgment. In many such cases nature should be allowed to take its course and the inevitable reorganization take place. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States if they understand this proposition would desire to commit the Government to the policy of taking the money that has been raised by taxation from the people or that has been secured by the sale of bonds, and put it behind corporations that are in such condition financially that they can not secure money that they need otherwise. For that reason I hope that this section will be stricken from the bill. If the section is stricken out I feel that I could then conscientiously vote for the bill, as I would like to do. I do not like to take the responsibility, and I have no doubt that there are other men on this floor who feel the same way, of denying this relief if it is necessary, and I am not so sure but some legislation is necessary; but I want to see it done in a way that will not be unsound. If any scandals arise in connection with the operation of this corporation, they will arise as a result of extending loans under this section.

If there is any loss to the corporation the loss will come as the result of extending loans under this section 9.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And all complaints with respect to those who are favored.

Mr. HAYES. The complaints of favoritism and politics and many other complaints will come from loans made under this section, and it should be stricken out.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 154. Joint resolution authorizing the erection of a memorial in Washington to the memory and in honor of the members of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9314) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. JONES of Washington as the said conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDUSTRIAL CREDITS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, it seems that those gentlemen who are ready to support the bill without section 9 are ready to "swallow a camel but strain at a gnat." The bill is palatable to very few of us. It would not have a handful of supporters in this committee but for the exigencies of the military situation. After all, it is not a finance bill, but, as its title truly describes it, it is a military measure. It is a military measure brought forward in the course of our painful, and necessarily painful, efforts to organize for the conduct of this war, our efforts to make ready to bring great pressure to bear against the enemy. The very circumstances under which the bill comes to the House point to the gravity of the situation and oppose the views of gentlemen who quarrel with this section. The situation in Europe was never so grave as it is to-day. Happily, the situation in this country is better. I think none of us, even those of us who have been critics of the War Department, would gainsay for a moment that there has been a great improvement on this side of the Atlantic; and I for one am very glad to testify that the appointment of Gen. Goethals, Gen. March, Mr. Baruch, and Mr. Stettinius all promise wider vision and greater energy in the supply of the Army. Standing on this side of the House I am very ready to give cordial credit to the President and the administration for these changes.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I saw an editorial this morning—I do not want to divert the gentleman's line of thought——

Mr. McCORMICK. I have substantially concluded.

Mr. COX. In the Post to the effect that about 62,000 soldiers down here were, like Job's war horse, wanting to sniff the breeze of battle from afar off, wearing a uniform in a person holding a commission as lieutenant or captain.

Mr. McCORMICK. The gentleman refers to what the soldiers call "Bevo" officers, I suppose.

Mr. COX. I would rather call them "tin Lizzie" officers; I think that fits them better. What does the gentleman think about stacking up the Army in this country with 62,000 commissioned noncombatant officers, stored down here in the various departments, doing nothing in the world but clerical work? Does not the gentleman feel that those men should be put on the firing line, if they want to keep their commissions, and let the civilians go down there and do this work that women can do?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think there probably are officers among the 62,000 who ought to be on the firing line. I want to repeat with emphasis that the changes in the War Department and the appointment of the four men whom I have named promise great energy and greater vision in the conduct of the war.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Would the gentleman say also since the Secretary of War has gone to France?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think it was an admirable step for the Secretary to take.

Mr. PLATT. Since which certain important changes have taken place in the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMICK. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman feel that if this measure is not enacted into law that the winning of the war by the United States would be much more difficult?

Mr. McCORMICK. I feel that the enactment of this measure will contribute to the winning of the war by the United States. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back a half a minute.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use up some of his time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], to be used by him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the motion of the gentleman from California to strike this section from the bill. As I understand the measure, any concern that desires the assistance of this war finance corporation can apply under the authority granted by the other sections of the bill to banks, bankers, and trust companies and receive relief through those institutions. Am I correct in that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why, the major portion of the business was to be done through the banks.

Mr. SWITZER. Certainly. That being true, the banker or trust company to which they apply will likely have more knowledge of the affairs of the institution, corporation, or individual that desires relief through this war finance corporation, and it seems to me that all ought to submit to that rule, that there should not be an additional section incorporated in this bill in reference to any exceptional cases, and the Lord only knows what the exceptional case is. Some gentlemen, I presume from Wall Street, because this section merely creates a Wall Street annex, that started some holding corporation somewhere, loaded up on public utilities or railroads or other things of that character which become a little burdensome and troublesome to carry, and not wanting to pay the larger rate of discount that he has to pay at the banks, as shown here by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], can get some of the war finance corporation's easy money provided he can establish a pipe-line connection with this corporation. True, no man can obtain a dollar from this war finance corporation unless he has the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury.

But the Secretary of the Treasury may be ever so honest, and no matter how wise he is, recollect that the fellows that looted the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railway and have looted some of these other corporations that will be applying here for relief, will be lying in wait for the Secretary of the Treasury, and through this Wall Street annex they will get their arms way down into the United States Treasury, clear up to the shoulders.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill has had more offensive epithets applied to it by gentlemen who intend to support it than any bill we have considered for a very long time. Gentlemen refer to it as vicious legislation. Some have said that it was appalling, and the very thought of Congress considering a proposition like this appalled them; that it could not be justified; and yet they have generally ended their remarks by saying that they were bound to support it.

Now, is it appalling? I will agree that in ordinary times, in times of peace, legislation of this kind would be appalling, and that it would not be considered in this House or in the Senate for a minute. But is it appalling now? We must not forget that the situation we are trying to meet is appalling. We are facing a crisis, and if we expect to do our duty at this time, if Congress expects to meet this crisis, they can not hope to do it by pursuing the ordinary course and following the usual and ordinary program that Congress follows in times of peace. If so, we would better pass the usual appropriation bills and go home. We would better just say to the country and the world that we have abandoned this war, because we know ordinary legislation will not meet the situation. [Applause.]

It is extraordinary legislation, because it must meet an extraordinary condition. And I think it is the opinion of the men best competent to judge that this bill comes as near meeting the situation as anything that has been suggested or has been devised. Now, we will all agree that the war industries of the country must be supported. Nobody in the House or anywhere that is loyal to the flag will deny but that we must by extraordinary legislation meet the extraordinary conditions and provide means for maintaining the war industries of the country. Who here or anywhere has suggested anything that appeals to you as a better means of meeting the situation than this bill which we are considering now? There are industries in the country which they tell us can not be provided for by sections 7 and 8 of the bill; that their securities are of such a character that the banks can not handle them; and this section 9, to which gentlemen seem to make special objection, is provided to meet that kind of cases. Suppose there is a war industry of great importance to the country; suppose it is necessary in supplying the Army; suppose its product is such that the country must have it at this hour, and it does not have that kind of security that the Federal reserve banks or the banks of the country can handle, this law provides that that concern may put up 133 cents for every dollar of the loan and get money direct from the corporation. It does not mean that it is to help bankrupt organizations. This corporation may loan money directly to sound, safe financial institutions that need money at this hour, concerns that can give as security 133 cents for every dollar that they borrow, concerns that must have money to provide for expanding operations to meet the demands of the Army and of the country. Now, that is what that section means, and I submit to you, gentlemen, there is no more reason for striking it out. It is as important as sections 7 and 8 and as essential to the purposes of the corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me the gentleman from Illinois, who has just spoken, thoroughly understands this section. It is a section which makes this institution practically an independent bank.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman yield for a moment. My understanding was that the time was to be apportioned by the gentleman from North Carolina and myself.

Mr. HAYES. I have one-third of the time, I believe.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that one-third of the time was to be yielded to the gentleman in opposition to section 9. I have no desire——

The CHAIRMAN. The agreement entered into by the committee was that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] should control 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] 20 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] 20 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I have made a mistake in introducing one or two speakers, and I presume the gentleman from California will give me credit for that time. I have yielded him more time than was fair under the circumstances. But if he desires to introduce his own speakers, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] should be attributed to him.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes will not be charged, then, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PLATT. If I can receive time from both sources, I am, at least, satisfied.

As I started to say, section 9 of this bill makes the proposed Finance Corporation an independent bank. And it is dangerous, because it is not connected, that part of it, with the banking system of the country. It will certainly be an instrument of inflation as an independent organization, and it will not have the opportunity to know to whom advances should be made that the banks will have.

Now, it seems to me the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, did not make out at all a good case for this independent action, and almost half expected to see it stricken out. His answers to questions in the hearings indicate that he does not expect to operate this section.

On page 85 of the House hearings he says, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]:

> Yes. Exceptional cases, as I stated before, which the War Finance Corporation would consider would naturally be cases where it was clearly shown that the applicants had resorted to the banks, but were unable to get accommodation from them. This corporation will want this business to come to it from the banks.

Bear in mind that the Secretary was talking of section 9, but there is no provision in section 9 which says business must come to the corporation from the banks. Continuing, the Secretary said:

> That method will relieve it of an immense amount of administrative detail and investigation.

If this section is stricken from the bill it seems to me it would compel the business to come to the banks; if it stays in people that want to raise money for public utilities and other things will come here to Washington and see the finance corporation people first before going to the banks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And in addition to the view that the Secretary and the administration have in mind now, would not relief appeals come in from the outermost corners of the United States?

Mr. PLATT. There is not the slightest doubt of it. There ought to be something in the law, if passed in this form, to safeguard the corporation from having these people come here, without at least indorsement of these schemes from the banks on the ground.

Mr. REED. This section is the one which, if cut out, would eliminate our farmer friends, is it not?

Mr. PLATT. Not at all.

Now, I want to show you how the bill would work if section 9 were cut out. Further on the Secretary says:

> It would be an immense aid to the War Finance Corporation to have the banks do that work. Advances made to the corporation through the bank will have the guarantee of the bank.

He is talking about section 9, and seems to talk as if it were operating through the bank. If we cut it out what will happen? A business concern or public utility wanting funds will go to the bank and the bank will say, "Yes; we will let you have this money if the corporation will take up your securities for us." The bank will then take the matter up with the corporation, and the corporation says: "We will let you have 75 per cent of this money on the collateral mentioned." This will give an additional safeguard. The bank indorses the note, and there is no reason under the heavens why any enterprise whose securities were licensed by this corporation could not obtain all the capital it needs without resorting to any direct loans.

The Secretary, as I said, apparently means that that is the way it is going to work. Yet if the section is left standing as it is, it will not work that way, because it can not. These people will come immediately to Washington for direct loans. To be sure, in the parentheses there is a clause saying that direct loans are to be made only when they can not get accommodation in the banks, but it does not say that the banks to whom application may be made must first have taken the matter up with this corporation.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. When will it be found out that the institution or borrower is unable to get accommodation from the local banks? Who is to find out? That will be taken up ordinarily by the banker.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And you would have applicants coming on to Washington showing that the local bank was unfair.

Mr. PLATT. It will not hurt this bill a bit to strike this section out of it. It is dangerous, and it is going to cause tremendous pressure on the Secretary of the Treasury and on the directors of this corporation for direct loans over the heads of the banks. It is entirely unnecessary, and no good case has been made out for it either by the Secretary of the Treasury or by Mr. Warburg. It is true that certain public utilities men are quoted in the Senate hearings—not in the House hearings—as being somewhat in favor of it; but even they indicate that they could get the money from the banks if provision were made for rediscounting. This bill creates a place where the banks furnishing such accommodation can have notes rediscounted on stock and bond collateral, and with that added privilege they can take care of everything that can possibly come up, I believe, without this section.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The national banks are allowed to loan only a certain percentage of their deposits?

Mr. PLATT. Yes—that is, not more than 10 per cent of their capital and surplus to any one person or corporation.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Does not this bill open the door for people wanting to borrow more than that to come direct to the Government?

Mr. PLATT. There may be something in that; but if that is the reason for this section it is nowhere stated in the hearings either of the Senate or of the House. There are a good many banks that have a capital and surplus running into the millions, and by dividing up underwritings they are not much troubled by the 10 per cent limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PLATT. I would like to have a couple of minutes more.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. If that is not so, it has not been stated in the hearings anywhere, and it is not to be counted upon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] misconstrues the idea of this bill very largely. He is looking at it solely from the banking standpoint. The committee is not looking at it from that standpoint, nor is the Secretary of the Treasury or the advocates of this legislation.

The reason for section 9 is very plainly stated in lines 20 and 21, where it is provided that this money can be loaned "to persons, firms, corporations, or associations conducting an established and going business in the United States." Then the words are added "whose operation shall be necessary and contributory to the prosecution of the war." That is what section 9 is for, to help going business concerns whose welfare has to do with the carrying on of the war.

I heard one gentleman remark only yesterday that even if the Government, in spite of all the security, required 133 per cent of collateral and the other safeguards in line of security, even in spite of those facts, if the Government should happen to lose money—and he used figures to the amount of $100,000,000—we would be doing it for the benefit of war industry that must have capital and must have backing, whose contracts are for Government purposes. Therefore if loans are to be made to them for purposes necessary or contributory in the prosecution of the war, even in the end if we did not get every dollar of it back, the money would be well invested. We can not consider this matter from the viewpoint of banking principles pure and simple. We must consider it from the standpoint of the welfare of the Government in the prosecution of the war and necessary financial support to going business concerns who are carrying on war business. For that purpose capital is required and must be had for Government work and Government needs. Therefore it seems to me that section 9 is very essential to the public welfare and to the successful operation of this measure.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly, if you can get me time. I had only two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HAYES. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the observation of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. TREADWAY] is very interesting in view of this particular paragraph. He says that this must not be considered from the banking standpoint, and yet this paragraph has nothing in it except from the banking standpoint. This is the only paragraph in the bill that permits this corporation to operate as a bank. If you would read the bill with that point in view you would see signal warnings set up all through the bill. You will notice in the very first paragraph that it is a Government institution, the directorate of which is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and therefore it is a governmental corporation with a banking function, which is the only banking institution purely governmental; it thus differs from National and State banks, and if you will notice the seventh section, the operations in detail are limited to banks, bankers, or trust companies, so that the corporation in the main, except in this section, where the banking activity is permitted, is dealing not with an individual as a bank deals with an individual but it is dealing with bank, banker, and trust company in each case in a representative capacity and not in an individual capacity. This section creates a governmental institution with banking functions. Then if you will read section 9 you will notice the phraseology is that in rare exceptional cases a limitation in terms, which may become the general rule for operation, with a further limitation put in the parentheses, proof must be had that the banks will not respond to the demands of the individual before this banking function will be exercised on behalf of the individual. That is a limitation in itself, and if you will read on page 15, section 17——

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield right there?

Mr. FESS. In a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FESS. You will notice that this governmental institution in section 9, provided to operate as a bank, is not a governmental institution in responsibility, because section 17 distinctively exempts the Government from any responsibility in the obligation it takes on. This section reads:

SEC. 17. That the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation.

There is another limitation on the banking function as herein provided by fixing a maximum amount any individual can secure by direct issue to 16⅔ per cent, or one-sixth of the capital stock and outstanding bonds.

Still another danger signal is hoisted in requiring a penalty in the form of 1 per cent additional interest to be charged on such issue or loan.

In other words, here is granted a power to this "finance corporation" to become a competitor in the banking business, ostensibly and avowedly for the purpose of controlling rates of interest; a governmental bank to compete with National and State banks, neither of which is governmental, a power so unusual, and admittedly so dangerous, that it is completely hedged about, that we are assured that as it is now safeguarded it will do no harm. Now, in my judgment, reading from this particular paragraph, with these limitations spread all through the bill, you can not come to any other conclusion than that this section is the only section in the bill which permits a banking function to be exercised; and to me it becomes serious, because in this section you have created a separate banking institution, not in a general way but to deal in exceptional cases. And I ask this committee if they have purposely started out on an organization here under this industrial bill, as an emergent measure, to build up a separate banking institution to compete in order to control the banking activities of the country, and thus to deal with the individual and not with banks or trust companies? That is precisely what is in it, and, in my judgment, with the suggestions written throughout the bill, and the fulsome assurance that it must be and is so hedged about that it will not be allowed to produce serious dangers; that it will be used only when the crisis comes, and then only as a last resort, does not produce a degree of confidence the country demands. This is the reason why it seems to me it would be better to eliminate it and to let the bill stand as it was originally written, to serve the country through the banks and the trust companies rather than to operate as a bank directly on the individual, and therefore perform the function of a bank, a matter certainly quite foreign to the primary purpose of the proposed remedy for the expansion of credits.

Mr. Chairman, this debate on the bill in detail creates a bewildering state of mind. We recognize the problem of financing the war. Its costs are not certain but we know they will be large. They must be paid and the money must be supplied. They should come from our savings, by tax, and loans. In each case the amount paid by citizens to the Government represents real income in the form of savings. Our people have the capacity and ability to thus finance this struggle, if they would be willing to produce the maximum and waste the minimum. The two duties that are clear are labor and conserve. This bill proposes in fear that we can not finance the war by our savings, converted into tax and loans to the Government, to supply these deficiencies by credit and pay for the war by deferred obligations. This is excusable only on the basis of necessity growing out of inability to pay as we go. The Government also proposes to conserve by regulation of expenditures of money through a Capital Issues Committee. This provision, which may be necessary, carries vast and startling powers. It vests in a committee the power of complete strangulation of business which that committee might think unnecessary to win the war. Ordinarily such power concentrated into the hands of a committee, when the power goes to the very current of the industrial, and it may be political, life of the Nation, would be looked upon as a step little short of madness. Yet we are told that money allowed to be locked up in enterprises that might wait until after the war might interfere with the successful prosecution of the war.

We should see what this power may mean in the disturbance of enterprises, the employment of labor, the production of incomes out of which taxes to the Government may be paid.

While Members here vote for these revolutionary measures on the claim that the war demands it, we must not overlook the inevitable certainty that still other and more dangerous measures will be forthcoming and will be urged on the same basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, are there eight minutes remaining to this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has eight and one-half minutes remaining.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield three and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who has just taken his seat, has stated correctly, in my judgment, that this corporation will in some instances perform banking functions; but it is to be only in rare and exceptional cases, caused by this tremendous war which is upon us and the extraordinary demand for funds which it has created. The fact that some gentlemen, like the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], wish to strike out this section, while others, like my colleague [Mr. GOOD] and some others that I might mention, wish to have this section expanded so as to include firms and corporations whose business was not contributory to the prosecution of the war; and the fact that the bill which recently passed the Senate contains in this same section powers still more expanded beyond what are granted by this bill, indicate to me that the Committee on Ways and Means has, after all, taken the golden means between these two extremes.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can hardly yield in the three minutes and a half that I have. There are two classes here; one who, no matter what extremity might come upon a corporation that was perfectly solvent and perfectly sound, but in the dire stress of war unable to obtain money from the banks, would not want to let them have any money under any circumstances direct from the corporation. There is, on the other hand, another class who want these privileges extended to everybody. Instead of doing that, we cut down and limited this privilege to those very exceptional cases where the money could not be obtained from the banks upon fair and reasonable terms; where the corporation was in fact solvent and was able to put up the security which would in any event, we believe, make the Government safe; where, in fact, there was no risk taken, but the Government was simply sustaining an institution necessary at this particular time to the life of the Nation and the success of the war.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And they may extend that credit for the period of five years.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They may extend that credit for the period of five years, because the particular class of corporation that would apply under this section would have no other kind of paper to offer except long-time paper.

Mr. REED. And require a high rate of interest.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And require a higher rate of interest.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Is it not a fact that these very securities which these concerns could not dispose of at the banks, but which they may dispose of to the corporation under section 9, might be more desirable loans for the corporation than the other kind of paper?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Under certain circumstances they might be the best that could be obtained.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will gentlemen on the other side consume some of their time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I know of no section in this bill which is so buttressed with safety provisions as the section we are now considering. In the first place, if this credit is to be extended directly it must, first of all, be in an exceptional case. In the second place, the person or the firm, corporation, or association requesting it must have exhausted their remedy through the ordinary banking channels. In the third place, they must have exhausted their remedies in their efforts to get money from the general public. Then the total amount of the loans that can be extended under this section is limited to 16⅔ per cent of the paid-in capital of the corporation at the time the loan is made plus the aggregate amount of the bonds outstanding at the time the loan is made; and the security tendered must, first, be adequate security and, in addition to that, it must be security equal to at least 133 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation. And that is not the only safety buttress which surrounds this section. In addition to all this, the corporation retains the power to require additional security at any time. In addition to all this, and underlying all these safety provisions, is the fundamental requirement that the loan must be made with the idea of further providing for the national security and defense, and the credit extended must be to an industry or an enterprise which is in the United States and which contributes to the successful prosecution of this war. I know of no further safety buttresses that could be placed about this particular section. Yet we are told by the critics of this section that this is a method of relieving millionaires.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the gentleman has overlooked the provision for 1 per cent additional interest.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman. That is an additional security, making it necessary that this loan shall be abandoned by the person who obtains it at the earliest possible moment in order to get cheaper money from some other concern if he can. Yet we are told that this is a proposition to finance millionaires as opposed to the general public, and we are told that the thing to do is to strike out this clause and let these institutions, necessary for the prosecution of this war, go into the hands of receivers, and that a receivership is not a calamity; that a receivership may be a tremendous benefit in some sort of a disguise.

We are told in a case of this kind when these enterprises are unable to finance themselves in the ordinary channels, except by paying the exorbitant demands of bankers and brokers, to which the gentleman from Iowa referred a while ago, where $10,000,000 was demanded to finance a bond issue for $30,000,000—we are told to "let nature take its course"; let nature, in this abnormal period, take the course it has heretofore, and let the institution go into the hands of a receiver Why, that is the way to play into the hands of the millionaire stockholders; that is the way to crowd out the little stockholders. Millionaire stockholders regard that as a blessing in disguise; this is a pleasing and delightful proposition to many of the millionaires of this country who invest in these enterprises. [Applause.]

VULTURES OF FINANCE WILL THRIVE WITH THIS SECTION OUT.

To strike this section out would seriously impair the usefulness of this bill. Strike it out and you give the vultures of finance their opportunity. Millionaire war profiteers will hail with joyous acclaim your action. Strike this out and you will leave at the mercy of rings of bankers and brokers institutions whose operation is necessary for our national security and defense. Strike it out and you will turn over to the tender mercies of financiers of the old school industries and enterprises which must go on during the period of this war.

The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], voicing the methods of the school of financiers whose operations were a familiar feature of our industrial life prior to the Federal reserve act, insists that a receivership "is not always a calamity," and then he proceeds to say, "let nature take its course—let the reorganization come." A receivership is never a calamity to millionaire investors. It is their opportunity, especially if the institution is a public-utility corporation, to crowd out the smaller stockholders who are unable to buy at a receiver's sale. A receivership has always presented the opportunities a certain class of financiers expect and enjoy. To them it is never a calamity. It is only a calamity to the small investor. This paragraph protects industries and enterprises which are necessary or which contribute essentially to the prosecution of this war, against just such conditions as the critics of this section champion now on this floor. This section protects from the wolves and the vultures of finance institutions which will otherwise be helpless as the war progresses. Strike it out and you will have destroyed an important feature of the bill and you will also have destroyed to a very large extent the remedies proposed by this bill. Permit these institutions and industries to come to the Government when they have been crowded out by rings of bankers and brokers and you will remove the incentive for crowding them out, and you will compel bankers and brokers to provide for them the credits they ought to have.

NEEDS OF PUBLIC-UTILITY COMPANIES.

During the present calendar year the public-utility companies of this country have obligations maturing to the amount of $232,000,000. During the calendar year 1919 they have obligations maturing to the amount of $265,000,000. The minimum of new capital they need this year in order to continue their operations is $250,000,000. These companies are furnishing heat, light, and power for our cities and villages and for all our industrial communities. They are moving the cars which carry laborers in essential industries to and from their work. They are furnishing the lights and the power which make possible the operation of hundreds of industries and enterprises in the United States which are necessary for the prosecution of this war. Turn them over completely to the tender mercies of financiers and bankers and brokers and you make possible the wrecking of all these industries. You make possible expensive receiverships. The more commissions they are compelled to pay this year and during the progress of this war—the higher interest rates they are compelled to pay—the higher the charges on the public for the service they render. This clause operates to protect them.

Our banks contain more deposits than ever before in their history. Our circulating medium never was so well secured as now. We have a gold cover of 67 per cent. We have a circulating medium of $48 per capita—nearly three times as much as it was 30 years ago—but there is not yet removed from the situation the possibility that rings of bankers and brokers and combinations of capital may throw into receiverships public-utility companies and hundreds of institutions essential for the winning of the war. Of course, there is presented the other alternative—the alternative of Government ownership, with all of its perils and dangers.

I am afraid we have buttressed this section too much with safety provisions. I am afraid it will be necessary to come back, in order to prevent financial calamities at some time in the not distant future, to ask the elimination of some of the safety provisions contained in this paragraph, but I hope it may not be necessary to do that. This section ought to stay in this bill. Leave it in and you eliminate many of the dangers of the immediate future; strike it out, as this motion proposes to do, and you will make possible receiverships all over the country, and you may also make possible Government ownership of many important public utilities. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that one reason why the class of bankers referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] to-day are very much in favor of this bill is due to the fact that this very keen class of bankers, who keep their ears very close to the ground on national or international conditions, is that now that our country is in war that many of the industries of this country, including the railroads, public utilities, and this class, which have been promoted and financed by these bankers at a profit, will have hard sledding, and that they would now prefer not to carry the responsibility, but that the whole people should carry this load now through the formation of this new corporation. The railroads under the railroad bill are already using this relief. I refer to the financing of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad in renewing last Saturday of $45,000,000 of maturing obligations, of which the revolving fund furnished $20,000,000. The public utilities are seeking $250,000,000 at once. [Applause.]

The following is the editorial in the New York Sun of March 20, 1918:

THE PLIGHT OF THE PUBLIC-UTILITY CORPORATIONS.

The applications made by the managers of public-utility corporations in the metropolitan district for permission to increase fares on the transportation lines under their direction and rates for gas and electricity have been received in the most unfriendly manner by the population generally. This was to have been expected. Here and in New Jersey the shortcomings of these corporations in service and the malodorous incidents that disfigure the records of all of them have brought them into disrepute. That will endure for years. This predisposes the public to declare judgment against them without discussing the validity of their requests for readjustments of fares and rates, and this predisposition must be taken into account when any application for relief is made by them.

The public believes that the fares and rates charged to-day are excessively high; that they provide a margin above operating expenses and maintenance cost amply sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds and fair dividends on the stock outstanding, even under the conditions of high wages and high prices now existing. The transportation lines and gas and electric companies are commonly regarded as gold mines, producing rich profits, which by some trick of bookkeeping or subterfuge of rascality are concealed from the public generally, and from investors particularly.

If the managers of these enterprises hope for relief they must overcome this belief and prove that the earnings of the corporation they represent are in fact too small to support them and to attract the capital needed for the increase of their facilities to suit the requirements of the population. They must convince not an impartial jury, but a jury packed against them.

Their task is difficult, but not impossible if they are in the desperate situation we are informed and believe they are in. Ten years ago, or even five years ago, it might have been impossible to bring about the revolution in sentiment they may now accomplish. To do it now will not be easy, but if it is not done the public-utility corporations need expect no support in their campaign for higher fares and rates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the House would make a very grave mistake if it struck out section 9 from this bill. It would put a great obstacle in the way of financial legislation to win this war. My friend from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] says that the situation provided for in this section is unthinkable. The gentleman from Missouri is a great financier, but the Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury say that it is not only thinkable but imminent, and with all respect to the gentleman from Missouri, I feel bound as a Member of this House to give some credit to their judgment in the matter.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Did the committee have before it any evidence of concrete cases of business that needs relief?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; we had some, but I do not believe I am at liberty to mention them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] said that all anyone would have to do under section 9 would be to lay a claim that he was doing something for the war. Does the gentleman from Ohio think the mere claim of doing something would get one anywhere or anything?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely not. They have got to show, before they get a cent, that it is impossible for them to get credit from the banks. The statement of Mr. Warburg before the committee presents this situation with admirable clarity, and I hope the House will bear with me while I read it. He said:

Let me give you what I believe to be the meaning of this paragraph. If we left it out, there would be two weaknesses in the law. One would be that a hue and cry would be raised that we are delivering the country into the hands of the bankers. It would be said that the Government is willing to provide for a tremendous amount of money which would be absolutely under lock and key, and nobody could get it out except a man who has a bank to stand sponsor for him.

It would not be right, either, to have it that way, because, as we have seen in the past, it might be feared by some that there might be a ring of bankers who could keep deserving people out.

For that reason it is necessary to have what we might call an "open-market clause," which is practically the same as the open-market clause in the Federal reserve act.

The other is that there may be possibly some industrial propositions which might be really essential for the well being of the country at this time, but which the banks might not be willing to guarantee, because, let us assume, the contracts are too short. They expire after a short while, and a big plant has to be created, and it may be considered bad business for a bank to finance that.

For such cases it would be very important that this institution, which represents the Government, could be free to say, "We will step in and help them out in that situation," although it must be the intention of this war corporation to deal as much as possible through banks and bankers.

That puts the question in a nutshell. I agree that the fear of my colleague, Mr. FESS, might be justifiable, had the committee not hedged this provision around with many safeguards. I agree that the bill as originally presented to us, giving to one man the power without limit to lend any amount of money up to four billions and a half to any one man or to any one set of men, would have been a most dangerous power, but the total amount that can be used under this section is only one-sixth of the entire amount available for credit. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has well described the various other safeguards, and I shall not enter into that now.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Can the gentleman conceive of a position where securities of a certain corporation are O. K'd by the committee provided for in this bill, and we will say that it wants to get a million dollars? It issues a million dollars of bonds and it goes to the bank and the bank says we can not lend you that unless the corporation will lend us the money first. If the bank can do that, why in the name of common sense should anyone be shut off under the provisions of this bill, with this section out?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before they can qualify for any loan under the section they have to show, first, that they have been to the bank and that the bank has refused them.

Mr. PLATT. Why should the bank refuse them when it can go to the corporation and get the money?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Perhaps the bank will not refuse them, but if you cut this section out it will make it impossible for any of these concerns to get relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] said that every intelligent man knew that anyone could go to a bank now with good collaterals and get all of the money he wants.

Mr. MADDEN. Can he?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Missouri is the only man, intelligent or otherwise, that I have heard make such a statement or who believes in such a statement.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman know of any war-contract men who are being held up for money?

Mr. KITCHIN. I know that all the evidence is that many, many persons and corporations engaged in the manufacture of articles necessary for the war can not go on unless they can get the Government either directly to loan them money or get it advanced through such schemes as this. The banks can not do it. The Government itself in a continuous, almost month after month, issue of certificates of indebtedness has exhausted all the surplus loanable funds of the banks. There are, in round numbers, $3,000,000,000 now outstanding, practically every dollar of which was furnished by the banks to the Government. The Government, as I tried to explain the other day, and as declared by the Secretary of the Treasury, and we all know it except the gentleman from Missouri, has by its sale of bonds and by its proposed sale of bonds and by its issue of certificates of indebtedness preempted the whole money and credit market of this country, and there must be a recourse for the necessary war industries, either directly to the Treasury—and that would mean more bonds, more certificates of indebtedness, and more taxes—or we must resort to a scheme like that in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman recall the testimony with reference to the 30 per cent advance on war contracts through the departments which would be systematized under this legislation?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

But now as to the objection to this section. I fear that the gentleman from California and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], who are the most earnest opponents of this provision and who themselves are bankers, look at all financial measures through the eyeglass of banks. They can not understand why there should be a check or a Government eye or a Government hand upon banks. Strike this provision out and the banks will have unlimited power to extortion upon the industries which this bill is designed to help. They can charge any rate of interest or discount or continue to crush out competing industries in favor of others, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] this morning showed they had done in the past and will do again unless restrained in some way. This provision prevents them from doing such things.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, I know the gentleman is honest. I know Mr. HAYES is honest in opposition. I would take Mr. HAYES's or Mr. MCFADDEN's judgment upon questions of banking as quickly as that of any man in this House, but this is not a banking proposition. This is a proposition of sustaining this Government in this most extraordinary crisis, when the banks alone are unable to do so.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has assumed, of course, I am opposed to this provision, but he does not know that. I would like to inject right here that the deposits of the banks of the country are larger now than they were a year ago.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right, let that go in; but the loans and discounts are larger than a year ago and the demands upon the banks are much greater.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now; let me get through with this. Without this provision or section, as I said, the banks would be absolutely free to charge what they wanted—5, 10, 15, or 20 per cent discount. They would be free to make such charges and to impose unreasonable terms, because they would know there was no other recourse, except to them, that no war industry could get relief except through them. But with this provision in the banks would know that if they began to extort unreasonable interest or discount rates or to impose unreasonable terms, the borrower would go at once to this corporation and get the necessary funds or relief. With this knowledge they would not attempt the imposition of unreasonable terms. They will do most of the business under this bill, but upon reasonable terms. And we put a limit to the amount of business or loans the corporation could do or make direct to any war industries. It can only do under this provision—the direct-loan provision—16⅔ per cent of the business; that is, it can only make direct advances under this section to an amount in the aggregate equal to 16⅔ per cent of the capital stock paid in and of the amount of bonds authorized to be issued and outstanding at the time. This will cause the banks to do their part and share their responsibility.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I prefer not to yield, because I have not the time.

Mr. PLATT. Could not this corporation absolutely control the rate of interest that any bank could charge by simply refusing it rediscount?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

If we had the amount which the corporation could advance direct under this section unlimited the banks would throw the whole burden of making loans to the war industries upon the corporation. They would force their own customers to go to the corporation for funds or collude with them to borrow of the corporation. For instance, corporation A, a big steel plant producing for the Government's account, would go to its bank for a loan. The bank would say, "You can not get it from us, go and get it from the War Finance Corporation that has $2,500,000,000 to help such industries as yours and deposit it with us. This will help us and you, too. We will save our funds for other business and can have the benefit of your deposit of the funds you get from the corporation." The banks, knowing of the limitations of this section, could not undertake such a feat with an intelligent customer. This limitation forces the banks to share in the operation and responsibility of the scheme proposed in the bill.

Mr. FARR. They must be substantial concerns in order to get help?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to ask the gentleman if he feels there is sufficient provision made for the relief of the public utilities under this section?

Mr. KITCHIN. I really do not know whether there is sufficient relief for the public utilities or not. There is much relief for them in this bill if they bring themselves within its terms. There are $2,500,000,000 of relief in the bill, and if they shall be deemed by the directors to be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war they have a right to apply for relief just as other war industries.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman will agree that the public utilities are in need of $250,000,000 almost immediately?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know. I agree they say they need $250,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to point out to the gentleman right here that it is utterly impossible for them to get the relief under this provision.

Mr. KITCHIN. They have as much right to get relief under that provision as any other corporation or firm in the United States that qualify under it.

Mr. McFADDEN. And they must put up securities of 133 per cent margin?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I can not yield further.

We have all the hedges and limitations surrounding this provision or section, which gentlemen wish to strike out, that any business man should want. Before a borrower under this section can procure advances he must show, first, that he can not get it from the banks of the country; second, that his industry is necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war; third, he has got to put up 133 per cent worth of securities; fourth, he must pay not less than 1 per cent per annum interest in excess of the prevailing rate for 90-day paper at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrower is located. Then we have the 16⅔ per cent limitation, to which a moment ago I alluded.

Now, gentlemen, let me say one thing in reference to this bill, which equally applies to many other bills that I have voted for. A certain gentleman said yesterday that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, referring to myself, seemed to be very fearful of this bill and its effect. Yes, gentlemen, I am fearful of this bill and its effect. I am very fearful of many bills with their new and unprecedented provisions and powers and their effect for which I have voted since we declared war, and every other gentleman who loves his country, its traditions, and its institutions should be fearful; but because I have such fears do not make it any less my duty to vote for this or any other legislation where it seems necessary to support and maintain this Government in this extraordinary struggle.

When I was a young man I belonged to a little amateur fire company in my town. When the fire bell rang, I was one of the first men on the ground, and one of the first on top of the house. I never went to the roof while the flames were licking about it that I did not have fears and anxieties, but in spite of them I went to the top, because it was necessary to go there in order to save the house from destruction. And that is the way I feel about these war measures, gentlemen. They are emergency measures, they are abnormal, they are extraordinary, they are unprecedented. I view many of them with fear and anxiety, but in spite of such fears and anxieties my patriotic impulses impel me to vote for them, because they are necessary to protect and save my Government and my country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time is expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HAYES. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 84.

So the motion to strike out the section was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this title to any one person, firm, corporation, or association exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. I am not sure that I know just what the purpose is in the committee putting in this provision. If it means by section 10 to refer only to section 9, I can understand the purpose, namely, that when the corporation, so called, makes advances to firms, persons, corporations, or associations, and so on, directly, they can not make advances in excess of 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation. If that is what is meant, section 10 covers it.

If, on the other hand, it means something else, I do not think it expresses that idea at all. If it means this, that in no case can an advance be made on the security of a single corporation, person, or association, then it does not express that idea clearly. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina what it means?

Mr. KITCHIN. The intention is very clearly expressed, I think, when you understand the purpose of the committee. It is that no one concern or individual or partnership or corporation or association can ever have advanced to it and outstanding at any one time an amount in excess of 10 per cent of the capital stock of the war-finance corporation.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; but, directly or indirectly—does it mean directly to the corporation, association, or firm or individual, or does it also mean indirectly through the banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. It is not based on the security.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, I submit it does not say so in this section, and with that view I will offer an amendment for the purpose of discussion, because I do not think it accomplishes that purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman says this does not limit it. If a bank or a corporation wanted $51,000,000 it could not get $51,000,000. Our contention is that it could never get over $50,000,000. No one bank, no one man, no one partnership or association or corporation can ever get and have outstanding at any one time a loan in any event of more than $50,000,000.

Mr. PHELAN. Let me take that up, if I have the time to do it. Here is a case. The bill says anything issued after April 6, 1917. Now, assume a case of the General Electric Co. Suppose the General Electric Co. already has bonds in the hands of the various banks amounting to $100,000,000; already, at the present moment. Now, the act becomes a law. Now, the various banks go up to the War Finance Corporation and they want advances made to them on these securities that they hold at this very moment. What is there in that particular section to prevent the war corporation extending loans to these banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of $100,000,000?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; of $100,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. The act says the corporation can not loan to any one person, firm, corporation, or association an amount in excess of $50,000,000.

Mr. PHELAN. It says in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this title to any one person, firm, or association exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation.

Let me give my case again. The General Electric Co. already has bonds with various banks amounting to $100,000,000. That is, to-day. This bill is not enacted yet. When this corporation makes advances under it, does it make advances not to the General Electric Co., but to the banks? If these banks take the securities of the General Electric Co. up to the war corporation, provided no one bank takes more than $50,000,000, then the war corporation under that provision is able to make advances up to $100,000,000, and there is not a thing in that provision to prevent that being done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. I would like to have my time extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; and I will offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment it withdrawn; and the gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PHELAN: Amend by striking out, after the words "Section 10," page 10, line 4, all the remainder of the section and inserting in place thereof the following:

"That in no case shall the securities of any one person, firm, corporation, or association be made the basis of advances made under this title to an amount greater than 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation, and in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made to any one person, firm, corporation, or association under the provisions of section 9 of this title, or to any savings bank, banking institution, or trust company under the provisions of section 8 of this title exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation."

Mr. KITCHIN. You put the case of an electrical company with $100,000,000 stock.

Mr. PHELAN. No; bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. What else now?

Mr. PHELAN. I will give the case again. The General Electric Co. has already outstanding $100,000,000 of General Electric bonds. These General Electric bonds are held by four different banks in sums of $25,000,000 each. That is the situation to-day, we assume. The bill is not yet an act. Now, the bill becomes an act and goes into operation. I say there is nothing in that provision to prevent the War Finance Corporation from loaning to each one of these four banks $25,000,000. Of course, it will be less than that——

Mr. KITCHIN. Why certainly it will be less. There is nothing in it.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; there is something in it, if the gentleman will permit me to say so. One thing is that all through this debate we have been misled as to what this bill permits. This bill does not intend necessarily that if a corporation wants to get some help it shall go to the bank, and the bank immediately shall go to the War Finance Corporation. This bill will permit the War Finance Corporation to help out a bank which already to-day has bonds coming within the description given in the bill, so that the advance is made to the bank and not to the corporation in many cases.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the gentleman's proposition, the effect of this legislation then would be to permit the rehypothecation or the loaning of further money upon collaterals which are already hypothecated.

Mr. PHELAN. To a greater amount than $50,000,000.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. There is not any question about it in my mind at all. I am assuming that the purpose of this paragraph is not to have in the hands of the War Finance Corporation securities of any one individual association or corporation to an amount greater than $50,000,000 as the basis for loans, no matter where those loans are made; but the trouble with the provision in the bill is that the advances are made to banks and not made direct to the corporation; the advances that are made to the banks may be made on security which they already own, and the advances made to the banks may not then go from the banks to the corporation whose securities are offered.

Mr. HELVERING. Of course, in every instance of that kind the bank would O. K. the paper on which the advance was made to the corporation.

Mr. PHELAN. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. HELVERING. According to this bill they would give their note to the corporation.

Mr. PHELAN. Give whose note—the bank's note?

Mr. HELVERING. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; the bank gives its note and gives the securities of the corporation as collateral; that is true.

Mr. HELVERING. Do you object to the bank making these advances if the corporation is secured by the bank?

Mr. PHELAN. Do I object to the bank making these advances?

Mr HELVERING. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. In the case I have given the bank has already made the advances. I have no objection to what the bank has already done.

Mr. HELVERING. Even if it is above $50,000,000. I understand the proposition is to limit all loans to $50,000,000.

Mr. PHELAN. No; my amendment simply provides for this. I submitted it only after the chairman told me what the purpose of the committee was. My amendment would prohibit the War Finance Corporation from holding securities of any one person, association, firm, or corporation to a greater amount than 10 per cent of the capital stock of the War Finance Corporation, or $50,000,000, as this bill is arranged. Is that clear to the gentleman? I think the provision in the bill does not do it. If the committee does not want it done, then my amendment carries out the purpose of the committee. If the committee does want it done, then the present provision in the bill is all right.

Mr STERLING of Illinois. I think I get the idea that the gentleman is seeking, but I think the gentleman is mistaken in this: If the General Electric Co. had borrowed on its bonds $100,000,000 from four banks, or $25,000,000 from each, those banks could not, on the ground that they had advanced loans to war corporations, go to this War Finance Corporation and get $100,000,000 They could get only $50,000,000, and they would have to stand for the rest of the loan themselves.

Mr. PHELAN. Suppose they have $150,000,000 of the General Electric bonds, and want to get $100,000,000. That will take care of the gentleman's point.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No; it does not. They could not get beyond $50,000,000 in any event. These banks have already loaned $100,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended five minutes. I do not believe I am understood on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. We will say that the General Electric Co. has borrowed $100,000,000 on its bonds.

Mr. PHELAN. Make it $150,000,000, and then you will be correct.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Well, I will say $150,000,000, but I do not think that makes any difference. It has already done that before this bill becomes a law.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Now, when this bill becomes a law, can these four banks, on the ground that they have advanced loans to war corporations, go to this war-finance corporation and get their money to replace these loans?

Mr. PHELAN. Absolutely, yes; if the war-finance corporation wants to loan the money to them, and that is the point that is not understood.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. They could get only $50,000,000. This paragraph prohibits that.

Mr. PHELAN. This paragraph does not do anything of the kind. That is the point I am making. This paragraph says:

That in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this title to any one person, firm, corporation, or association exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation.

But there are not any advances to be made to the General Electric Co. under this provision.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Oh, yes.

Mr. PHELAN. No; they have already been made. There are not any advances to be made.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The bill provides before this——

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will allow me to continue, there is the whole trouble. Here is the proposition: This bill is intended to enable the banks to take care of the various corporations and associations mentioned in the bill.

Now, when the bank gets the money the bank does not have to hand the money it gets from the War Corporation over to any association, even to the association whose bonds it puts up. It may take bonds it already has on loans already made and get the money from the War Finance Corporation, and the corporation will advance the money. So, therefore, when it says that in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this title to any one person, firm, corporation, or association exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock, it does not say what it means.

Now listen to the amendment: In no case shall the securities of any one person, corporation, or association be made the basis of advances made under this title to an amount greater than 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation.

That means that if you have the bonds, say, of the General Electric corporation, the War Finance Corporation, no matter where they come from, no matter how many banks or corporations, can not issue more than $50,000,000 on those bonds as security.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. That is not what the provision in the bill means. Why should it disturb the corporation that four banks with their notes should use as a basis of loans through those banks the securities of another corporation? The bank intervenes. The General Electric corporation, on its own account, can not get credit for more than $50,000,000 under the provisions of the bill; but 50 banks, giving their notes, with the securities of the General Electric Co., could get credit. That does not mean necessarily that they loan it to the General Electric Co. You might say that you could not accept the securities of the United States Government in excess of $50,000,000, although they might be presented by some 50 different banks.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman and I do not disagree as to what it means. I am not particular what position is taken by this committee. But I have offered the amendment, and I asked the chairman of the committee what the provision intended, and he said, as I understood him, they intended to provide for that I am intending to provide for in my amendment. The gentleman from Virginia and I agree that under the proposition as I suggested you could not have more than $50,000,000 security of the General Electric Co. made the basis of loans by the corporation. If you want it, I think I have put it in the form that you will get it. If you do not want it, then my amendment is not necessary. I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say that that was the intention of the committee. I am not desirous of its adoption. I simply suggested it, if that is the purpose of the committee. If it is not the purpose, I would like to know what the purpose of section 10 is.

Mr. GLASS. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PHELAN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman says that I am mistaken——

Mr. PHELAN. Oh, no; I did not say that the gentleman from Virginia was mistaken.

Mr. GLASS. I am referring to the gentleman from Illinois, who said I was mistaken. Suppose the Bethlehem Steel Co. had outstanding $200,000,000 of bonds, not in the hands of banks necessarily, but in the hands of individuals, and should it appear that at any one time the banks and going concerns and individuals all over the country had put up, through the banks, the securities of the Bethlehem Steel Co. for loans, does my friend from Illinois mean to say that loans could not be granted with these securities as a basis on the theory that loans were being made to the Bethlehem Steel Co.?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I mean to say that they could not be granted in excess of $50,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to make it clear with reference to the point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. His question is, Could the General Electric Co. get more than $50,000,000, provided it had already, before the bill became a law, borrowed $100,000,000 through four different banks? This bill provides that this corporation can loan money to a bank on the ground that it has already advanced loans to war corporations. That is one of the provisions of the bill. The corporation will loan money to the banks for the purpose of loaning it to war corporations, or they will loan it to the banks who have already furnished war corporations loans. Now, the General Electric Co. has borrowed $100,000,000 from four different banks. Then the bill becomes a law. Now, the banks desire to replenish their coffers from this corporation, and to do so they present the facts to the corporation that they have each loaned $25,000,000 to the General Electric Co. To do so they must indorse the paper that the General Electric Co. has put up. That is a loan by this corporation—what we have been calling in debate an indirect loan by the corporation through these banks. Of course, this section applies to indirect loans just as it does to direct loans.

Mr. GLASS. It would not necessarily mean the loans of the General Electric Corporation. Here is the National City Bank of New York, say, that has acquired $25,000,000 of the bonds of the General Electric Co. The General Electric Co. may not want to borrow any more money at all, but the National City Bank may want to accommodate customers by replenishing its cash, in order to do which it may want to borrow $25,000,000 on these securities. Do you mean to say that it can not borrow a large part of the $25,000,000 on the securities of the General Electric Co. merely because the General Electric Co. had theretofore borrowed $50,000,000 from the War Finance Corporation on its own account?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If it wanted to borrow money based on the fact that it has loaned money to the General Electric Co., it has got to show that fact, and get it under that section of the bill, and put up the paper of the General Electric Co. These loans can not be made in excess of $50,000,000. And these four banks could get from the corporation only $50,000,000 by reason of the limitation in section 10. It is true the bank is the borrower, but only the nominal borrower. The Electric Co. is the beneficial borrower, and the limitation applies to it as well as to the banks.

Mr. GLASS. Let me again suggest this instance. Suppose the Standard Oil Co. has outstanding $200,000,000 of bonds not owned by banks, but owned by individuals and corporations throughout the country, in all the States of the Union. Does the gentleman mean to say that when those individuals and corporations dealing with this war finance corporation have borrowed to the extent of $50,000,000 with the bonds of the Standard Oil Co. as collateral, this war finance corporation must stop doing business with any other individual or corporation in the United States desiring to use the securities of the Standard Oil Co. as collateral for loans?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It must stop making loans on the paper of the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. GLASS. That is an extraordinary proposition to me.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Because the Standard Oil Co. has borrowed $50,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that the General Electric Co. could not go to five banks and borrow $50,000,000?

Mr STERLING of Illinois. Not under this section 10. The aggregate of the loans can not exceed $50,000,000.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. As I understand the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], it is this, that he desires to prevent the finance corporation the power to loan in excess of $50,000,000 upon any securities offered by any one individual, firm, or corporation. Is that correct?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think that is his idea, and this bill already does that thing. It contains that very limitation, and his amendment is useless.

Mr. DEWALT. I think Mr. PHELAN's provision is a wise one, and if the bill already provides it, that settles it; but certainly the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] meets that condition if it is not covered by the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman means it provides it in this section 10 that I am trying to amend, does he not?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes; and it is made clear by clause 1, at the bottom of page 5. It applies to any bank, banker, or trust company which shall have made loans since April 6 and prior to this time, the same as in any other loan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he be granted five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman agrees with the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], that it should be done, but he says that it is already done.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That is my idea about it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. As I understand from the gentleman's statement, his view of the bill itself is, apart from the Phelan amendment, that by the terms of the bill in the case suggested a group of bankers holding the bonds of the General Electric Co. could not upon the hypothecation of those bonds secure from this general corporation a loan in excess of $50,000,000?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What is said in behalf of the bill with respect to the meaning of this section? Is it admitted that the bill means that?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think it means that, very plainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that is the gentleman's contention.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But is it the contention on behalf of the committee?

Mr. HELVERING. Not according to my idea.

Mr. GLASS. It seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois is clearly confusing the securities for the loans with the loans themselves.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Let me call attention to section 10. It provides that in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under the title to any one person, firm, or corporation or association exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation—in no case. That is as broad as you can make it and, of course, it applies to the beneficial borrower as well as the nominal borrower.

Mr. GLASS. It does not say that not more than $50,000,000 of the securities of any particular corporation shall not be used as collateral securities for loans to other persons.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. But this is a loan to an industry that is furnishing the securities through the banks.

Mr. GLASS. Not necessarily a loan to the corporation. It may be a loan to the bank to replenish its funds.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. You can not loan money to the bank. This corporation can not loan money to a bank, except the bank that has done something or wants to do something in aid of a war corporation.

Mr. GLASS. Of course not.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. A bank can not go to that corporation and borrow money on its own account, but only to enable it to advance aid to a war industry.

Mr. GLASS. A mutual savings bank can.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I am talking about banks generally.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The controversy between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has confused a good many of us. Take the case cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Bank A would take its securities of the General Electric Co. and get money in the form of bonds out of the corporation to the extent of $25,000,000. Bank B can take its securities, properly indorsed, and receive $25,000,000 on them in the form of bonds. Bank C proceeds with its securities, indorsed, and could it get anything?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No; it would not get anything, because that corporation already has $50,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Let us eliminate the banks altogether and suppose that each Member of this House has a million dollars' worth of the bonds of the Standard Oil Co.—a rather violent presumption.

Does the gentleman mean to say that after 50 Members of the House, with these bonds as collateral security, had received in the aggregate $50,000,000 in loans, no other Member of the House could get any loan from this War Finance Corporation based upon the securities of the Standard Oil Co., provided the loan was wanted to finance a war industry?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That is just exactly what I mean.

Mr. GLASS. Then I would not vote for a bill containing as crude a proposition as that.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The purpose, I say, of the committee was to limit the loan to any concern, whether it be a direct or indirect loan.

Mr. GLASS. The loan would not be to the Standard Oil Co., but it would be to the 435 Members of this House, with the securities of the Standard Oil Co. put up as collateral.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It is what this bill terms an indirect loan.

Mr. GLASS. It would not be a loan at all to the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That is what this bill regards as an indirect loan. It is a loan to that company. It is the beneficial borrower.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a great deal of confusion as to the plain language of the bill. I hate to differ with the gentleman from Illinois, but I think——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? I desired to ask this question of the gentleman from Illinois, but will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Do not take it out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman is running.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, as long as the gentleman had 10 minutes I would ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Gentlemen, the bill means just exactly what it says, and the language conveys only the intention which the committee had. The committee felt that we ought to have some limit on the amount which this corporation can loan to any one person or corporation. Of course, when it loans to a bank it loans directly to the bank. The original bill had no limitation in it at all. The corporation could loan one hundred million or a billion to any one concern. The Senate bill has no similar limitation. Now, we felt it was the wisest thing to provide a reasonable limitation, and we looked to the national banking law, as that had worked pretty well in this country for 50 years or more, so far as this provision is concerned. The national banking law provides that you can not loan of the capital stock and surplus—there is no surplus in this corporation—more than 10 per cent to any one concern. Now, the national bank with $100,000 can only loan me $10,000, 10 per cent of its capital stock and surplus.

Suppose I want $50,000 and there are five national banks in my town, each with $100,000 capital stock and surplus. I would borrow from each bank $10,000 and get $50,000, but no one bank has a liability against me for more than $10,000. That is all that that bank can ever lose, and it is all that that bank has possibly risked. The other four banks will stand the chance to lose the amount they have loaned. Now, it makes no difference so far as this bill is concerned what kind of security is put up. I can have American Telephone Co. stock to the amount of $500,000. I can give each one of those banks $20,000 of that stock for security for my loan of $10,000, and the national banking law can not and does not touch that. This bill intends to follow that. It intends to say that this financial corporation, as stated by this bill, can create no liabilities to any one person, firm, or association in excess of 10 per cent of the capital stock of the finance corporation. The capital stock of that corporation when paid in will be $500,000,000. So, then, this bill says in language just as plain as it can be put that no concern, individual, corporation, or association can borrow of this corporation an amount in excess of 10 per cent of the capital stock of the corporation, or $50,000,000, because that is 10 per cent of $500,000,000.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does the gentleman claim that a bank can borrow money for its own purpose, for its own use, whether or not it has advanced or is about to advance money?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; except in the case of the savings banks and similar institutions under section 8.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Now, does the gentleman say that if the corporation gets the money through several banks and the bank then goes to this corporation to replace that money and puts up the security of the borrowing corporation, it can get $50,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir; under this bill.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Then, there is no limitation at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me illustrate.

Mr. GLASS. There you interpose the responsibility of the third party.

Mr. KITCHIN. Absolutely. The security has nothing in the world to do with their limitation, except it has to be good and adequate, and the amount must be equal to 133 per cent of the amount advanced.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Now, where is any limitation in the bill, if such a construction is right? There is none at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no limitation except right here where we put it in. I can show the gentleman that there are a great many concerns that are absolutely necessary to this war that will have to borrow more than $50,000,000. Certain railroads that are absolutely necessary for the prosecution of this war may have to borrow more than $50,000,000, possibly more than $100,000,000.

I have two in my mind right now that have to have money and have to refund their indebtedness within the next three or four months, and have to have over $50,000,000; and what this bill says is that such a concern or any other concern that borrows for the corporation can never be liable to the corporation for more than $50,000,000. That is, this corporation is not going to take the risk of over $50,000,000. Suppose the railroad must have $150,000,000. It can not get it direct from the corporation, because that concern, by putting up 133 per cent of securities, can not get more than $50,000,000 from this corporation direct. Suppose it wants to get $100,000,000 from the bank. This corporation is not going to lend any bank more than $50,000,000. Now, if that corporation can go to four banks and get $25,000,000 each from them, it is no concern of the corporation, provided the corporation is convinced that this money is needed for a war industry, for an industry that is absolutely necessary and contributory to the war. But say that it wants $100,000,000, and it goes to bank A and gets $25,000,000, to bank B and gets $25,000,000, and to bank C and gets $25,000,000, and to bank D and gets $25,000,000. This corporation is not going to allow a single one of those banks to have to exceed $50,000,000, but in getting $25,000,000 from each, the borrowing concern gets this $100,000,000. The corporation is not concerned as to whether or not some concern gets $100,000,000 from certain banks so long as these banks that have already become liable to it put up the required security, the notes of the concern and their own note, provided these banks are lending to a necessary war-contributing corporation or concern.

Mr. LONDON. Is not the difference between your construction of the bill and that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] this, that the gentleman from Illinois contends that the corporation can not risk more than $50,000,000, while you contend that the corporation can not loan more than $50,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. The corporation never can risk more than $50,000,000. The difference between the construction of the gentleman from Illinois and the construction of the gentleman from Massachusetts is that they put it upon securities. Here we have put it upon the original loan. As I said a while ago, we knew in the committee, and that the Secretary of the Treasury knows, and nine-tenths of the men of this House know, that there are some necessary war-contributing corporations in this country that must get over $50,000,000. If they can not get more than $50,000,000, though they have a billion dollars worth of securities, this act would not accomplish one of its chief objects. This corporation, by this act, can never permit any one concern to become liable to it for more than the $50,000,000. But if each one of these banks that will not loan $100,000,000 wants to become liable for $50,000,000, all right, but the corporation can not take their liability for more than $50,000,000. That is exactly like the national-bank illustration that I gave you.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman let me state a concrete case that is easily conceivable?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Suppose the Savage Arms Co. should own $50,000,000 of Pennsylvania Railroad stock, and the Bethlehem Steel Co. likewise should own $50,000,000 of Pennsylvania Railroad stock, and the Du Pont Powder Co. should own $10,000,000 of Pennsylvania Railroad stock, and the Remington Arms Co. should own $10,000,000 or $25,000,000 of the Pennsylvania Railroad stock, and they apply for loans, each of these concerns that are necessary to the conduct of the war apply for loans to this corporation, do you mean to say that one concern——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLASS. The putting up as collateral security the stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. would not exhaust the power of this corporation to loan to other concerns on Pennsylvania Railroad stock as collateral security. I am sure if the gentleman will go by himself and think of that proposition for five minutes he will reach a different conclusion from that which he has now.

Mr. KITCHIN. We are not limiting the amount which war industries can borrow from Tom, Dick, and Harry. We are simply limiting the liability of the concerns to this corporation.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois his interpretation of the meaning of this section. As I understand the gentleman from North Carolina, this section of the bill means this: That five banks can utilize the collateral of the General Electric Co., to continue the illustration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to the extent of $250,000,000, and get from this corporation $250,000,000, but the corporation itself—that is, the General Electric Co.—if it applied for a direct loan to this lending corporation, could not get more than $50,000,000. That, in your view, is the correct interpretation of the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is my view.

Mr. MADDEN. Neither could any one of the banks.

Mr. KITCHIN. Neither could any one of the banks get more than $50,000,000.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, we are not limiting the bank in the amount it can loan somebody else.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, in connection with that, if this does not illustrate it: The five banks have $250,000,000 of the General Electric Co.'s securities. They want $50,000,000 apiece. Do not they have to put up one-third as much in addition?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; they have to put up 133 per cent.

Mr. STEVENSON. And therefore the primary loan is to the bank and they have the security?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. They have the security.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, may I call the gentleman's attention to one other feature?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. There are but few banks in this country that can make a $50,000,000 loan. I want some gentleman to name five banks that can make a $50,000,000 loan.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. May I answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. PHELAN. If that is so, why is this provision in the bill?

Mr. GARNER. Something might come direct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] presuppose that these directors of this corporation will be absolutely unfit to administer the duties of the corporation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Do you mean the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; Mr. GLASS.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not so understand Mr. GLASS.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I understand it, all we intend to do is to try to protect the corporation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the corporation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And its loans?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Let me state it again. This is limited, first, in order to make secure all the money that the corporation shall loan, and another purpose is that it shall not make to any one person or concern or association a loan of more than 10 per cent of its capital stock. We intended to do just what the national bank act does, which everybody knows about.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. Let me read the language of section 10:

SEC. 10. That in no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this title to any one person, firm, corporation, or association exceed at any one time an amount equal to 10 per cent of the authorized capital stock of the corporation.

That is just as plain as language can make it, and I challenge anybody to conceive of language more plain to express the intention of the large majority of the committee. There is no use in having that language amended by the language that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] has offered. You could just put in five words after the word "to" on line 5—the words "on the security of any one person." But, gentlemen, then you are destroying one of the most beneficent objects of this bill. The object of this bill is to get money to keep these war-industry concerns going while we must have these necessary articles for the war.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. And your construction that you are putting on this will prevent that very thing. The Standard Oil Co. or the General Electric Co. might get every dollar under your construction of the law, and the war corporations of the country would not get any help.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then you ought to repeal the national banking law right now, which requires a limit of 10 per cent, because otherwise these concerns could get all the money under the general banking laws.

Mr. GARNER. Should we pass this bill if we are going to have five men who can give it all to the General Electric Co.?

Mr. KITCHIN. They can do no more under this provision than can be done under the general banking act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Gentlemen, I feel like asking your pardon for intruding on your time, but I feel very sure that I am right about this. I feel very certain, gentlemen, that my construction is right. But if it is wrong, then the bill ought to be changed. It ought to be so modified as to limit the loan to $50,000,000 to any corporation either directly or indirectly.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asked if the fundamental purpose was not this, in this provision of the bill, to make the corporation safe. Is that the fundamental idea in the bill, or is the fundamental idea in this bill to permit this corporation to help the war industries? Is not the purpose of the bill to help as many of those industries as possible? But if the construction put by the gentleman from North Carolina upon the bill is correct, there is absolutely no limitation here at all, and one corporation operating through a number of banks might absorb every dollar that the corporation would have to loan.

Now, what is the purpose of the bill? It is to distribute aid to the war industries throughout the country and not to give it to the General Electric Co., nor to the Standard Oil Co., not to give it to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., but to give it to all these industries, and it ought to be limited so that no one concern, either directly or indirectly, can get more than $50,000,000.

If one corporation can come in and by operating through half a dozen banks can get all this money, we had better stop right here with this legislation, because it would be an absolute perversion of the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury in asking for this legislation. It is not his idea at all. It was his idea to give money into the hands of this corporation so that everybody everywhere who was turning a wheel or lending a hand to carry on this war might have the necessary money.

Mr. KITCHIN. It was the Secretary's idea not to limit it at all.

Mr. GARNER. The Secretary in submitting the bill did not put a limit on it, and the committee, to protect the Government, put on a limitation.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That does not answer it at all. We know it was the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute this money, and if he did not have a limitation in the bill it was his purpose and intention—because he said so in the hearings—to distribute the money wherever needed for war purposes.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask, does the gentleman imagine that any board of business men, in conjunction with the Secretary of the Treasury, could possibly be assembled which would lend all this money to any one corporation, or to two corporations, or to three corporations, or to a dozen corporations?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If that be true, why does the gentleman oppose the limitation in this bill?

Mr. GLASS. You have that limitation in the bill, but the difference between the gentleman and myself is that he sees only the loan and I see the loan and the security for the loan, which are two very different propositions.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. And I see the usefulness of this corporation, provided it has a limitation which requires it to distribute the money to all war enterprises needing it.

Mr. GLASS. But if the limitation goes to the security, I think it is a pretty vicious provision. I would not be willing to vote for it with that limitation.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It does not go to the security at all. It goes to the amount that can be loaned.

Mr. GLASS. If it goes to the amount that can be loaned, there is no difference between the gentleman and me; but the gentleman's whole argument shows that he thinks it ought to go to the security and not merely to the loan.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I am not asking that the bill be amended. I think the bill now has just the limitation it ought to have. No single concern should be permitted to have all this money, nor should a few. The benefit it will afford should go to all that qualify for a loan.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, here is the way I understand this thing: Every applicant for a loan through this corporation will be considered a separate individual, company, or corporation. It does not make any difference whether it is a bank, an electric company, or a steam railroad company. If the bank should happen to have advanced the money to some corporation for the prosecution of the war, it will be entitled to apply to the War Finance Corporation for a loan. In order to obtain the loan it will be required to give its note and whatever security the law provides in addition to the notes. Now, whether that security be the bond of the electric company or the railroad company or the tobacco company does not make any difference, or whether it is a combination of all does not make any difference. Now, if 5 banks or 10 banks apply for loans, each application will be considered as a separate application and will be treated according to its merits. What the security may be which it has to offer will make no difference to the board of directors of this corporation except as to the validity and the value of the security.

Mr. GARNER. May I illustrate that in the gentleman's time?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Suppose the Savage Arms Co. should want to borrow $50,000,000 from this corporation and the corporation should pass favorably on the loan, and the Savage Arms Co. should give 133 per cent security, consisting of their bonds. Then suppose a bank should want to borrow and should offer bonds of the Savage Arms Co. as security. They would have to put up 133 per cent of the loan, and the War Finance Corporation would determine whether the security was good and whether they wanted to make the loan.

Mr. MADDEN. And they would not consider at all the money that they had loaned to the Savage Arms Co. the day before.

Mr. GARNER. And they ought not.

Mr. MADDEN. They would simply consider the application of the bank when it was made and decide whether the security offered was sufficient to meet the demand of the law.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] is right, and the limitation in this bill goes to the security, then take the railroad company as an illustration. If that road had once borrowed $50,000,000, as it could directly, thereafter nobody else could borrow on the bonds of that road as security.

Mr. MADDEN. That is it exactly; and I maintain that it does not make any difference how much the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. or any other corporation may have borrowed through this War Finance Corporation, anybody else who qualifies for a loan should be favored with a loan, no matter whose security it may offer, if the security is considered of sufficient value to justify the loan. That is the point.

Mr. HELVERING. The fact of the matter is that this bill is for the purpose of facilitating credit and not for the purpose of restricting it. If the construction of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] is correct, it would restrict it.

Mr. MADDEN. Surely, and this bill is intended only to limit the power of the War Finance Corporation to the loaning of $50,000,000 to any one individual, company, or corporation. That applicants for loans may offer the same kind of security for the loans does not cut any figure whatever, in my judgment.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I should just like to know if the thing of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] complains can not be done now under the national banking law?

Mr. MADDEN. A national bank can loan only 10 per cent of its capital and surplus to any one borrower.

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Supposing the Remington Arms Co. should be the owner of $50,000,000 of the bonds of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.; being a munition plant necessary to the conduct of the war, putting up additional collateral, it borrows $50,000,000 from the war corporation. Then, according to the contention of the gentleman from Illinois, the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. could not borrow a dollar.

Mr. MADDEN. It would seem if, perchance, I had the securities of the gentleman from Virginia and I had to borrow money the day before from this corporation and found myself in a position where I had to have money, I could not get it.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Suppose $100,000,000 of securities of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is used as a basis for the issuance of bonds for 14 different companies. I understand how that could be, but suppose the company that is receiving the bonds is also the company whose securities are out. Could the Pennsylvania Co. secure a hundred million dollars of bonds through the bank on its own security?

Mr. MADDEN. The Pennsylvania Co. could borrow from your bank, if you had a bank; from my bank, if I had one; and from any other bank that was willing to lend the money to the railroad company. If by chance it had borrowed from any number of banks $500,000,000, that would not prevent the banks from whom it had borrowed from making a loan from the corporation through the securities of that company.

Mr. FESS. As I understand, the obligations of the finance corporation will be by the bank rather than by the company or the securities the bank has.

Mr. MADDEN. No matter who the borrower may be he will be the party held responsible for the loan made by the board of directors of this War Finance Corporation.

Mr. FESS. If any one company can get a hundred million dollars on its own credit through different banks, why is section 10 put in? It says it shall be limited to 10 per cent to any one firm, person, or corporation.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the best reason in the world for the language is that the Government of the United States wants to protect itself through this corporation against any single liability of any single firm, corporation, or association in excess of $50,000,000. If you loan the money on the securities of one corporation to the extent of $50,000,000, you have in addition to that the security of the concern to which you make the loan.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume only a moment. Mr. Chairman, I approved of this provision in the bill. I did not vote for it on any idea that it was a system to distribute money throughout the country. I voted for it for the purpose of obtaining additional security. I do not mean to say that the gentleman from Illinois advocates a pork-barrel proposition when he speaks of distributing the money to be obtained under the bill, but if it should act for that purpose it would merely be a pork-barrel proposition under which citizens from different sections of the country would come in and say, "We want our share in this section," and others from another, "We want our share in our section." That was not the purpose of the paragraph, and it would be entirely changed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]. The distribution of the fund will be fixed by the war necessities and the necessities of firms and corporations who show that they can comply with the purposes of the bill by either contributing to the prosecution of the war or to operations necessary to the war.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest, to the different interpretations which have been placed upon this very important section of the bill under discussion.

It must be admitted that one suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is well taken, that is, that it is conceivable that one single borrower, operating through a number of banks, might secure a very large sum, practically all the funds available to be loaned by the finance corporation. That I agree is conceivable, but there is much legislation that is susceptible of abuse on the theory that the officials clothed with large powers of discretion may abuse that discretion. In order to accomplish results, it is often necessary to invest an individual, or a group of individuals with large powers. These powers may be abused, to the prejudice of the public interests, but in the interest of positive achievements this chance must often be taken.

In this particular instance, what is in contemplation? The country is confronted with a condition of exigency. Large sums of money must be loaned to certain individual enterprises, necessary to the successful conduct of the war. In order that these large sums may be loaned, a gigantic corporation must be created, and large powers given, powers, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, that may be abused. But if we afford the powers, it is inevitable that the chances must be taken. The mere fact that the financial corporation may loan a very large sum of money to one borrower does not mean at all that the securities offered for this loan, which necessarily must be awarded through several banks, possibly a great number of banks, will be inadequate or insufficient.

It is perfectly conceivable that one individual concern, operating through a group of banks, may be able to obtain far more than $50,000,000 from the finance corporation, but looking to the securities that must be afforded in order to obtain that loan, it will be noted that the loan, according to the soundest principles of banking will be sufficiently protected. The operations of the proposed corporation are intended to be on a gigantic scale, but the aggregate value of the securities for these gigantic loans will be even more gigantic.

Mr. GLASS. And I would say to my friend it would have to be a mighty large group of banks. How many banks are there in this country that could loan as much as $5,000,000?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is perfectly true. There are few such banks. Another thing to be apprehended in this connection and never to be lost sight of is the fact that this is a war measure to be administered for war purposes, and war necessities. Is it conceivable that we will ever find any group of directors selected to discharge the responsibilities of this bill and cooperate to that end with the Secretary of the Treasury, who will so abuse their discretion and make their loans so unwisely, and so utterly without discretion, that they will defeat thereby the purposes of this act? It is conceivable that they may do this, but as a matter of likelihood, as a matter of probability, it is inconceivable that they will ever abuse their discretion to such an extent.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman will remember that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], in reading from the testimony of Mr. Warburg, read one reason why Mr. Warburg favored section 9, and that was that a ring of banks might get together and say that they would not loan this or that concern any money, and that the only recourse of that concern would be to go to the corporation. Might not a ring of banks get together, if there is no limitation as to the amount of money that the ultimate borrower may get, and agree to loan all this money to one or two corporations for their own benefit, in which perhaps they are concerned, in which they are directors?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will not the bonds of the ultimate borrower be submitted to the finance corporation? Will not the directors and the Secretary of the Treasury be called upon to pass on the transaction intended to allow one or more corporations not contemplated by this act to secure for their own benefit the money to be secured from the finance corporation? Will these officials be asleep when confronted with such a situation?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. If the gentleman thinks that security is the only thing to be aimed at in this, his argument is all right.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is certainly one thing to be considered in connection with a loan, but there is far more than the question of security to be considered. It may be that vital interests of our country may be involved in a proposed loan. What function are the directors and the Secretary of the Treasury intrusted to serve, unless it is to see that the business affairs of this corporation are to be conducted on sound principles, so as to promote the interests of the United States and win the war?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman admits then that it is possible?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, I admitted in the beginning that the powers given could be abused.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question in the time of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman from Illinois mention five banks in the United States that would be able to get as much as $30,000,000 of this money?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No.

Mr. GARNER. Then how are you going to get a ring to get more than $50,000,000?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman from Texas can not, either, and yet he was an ardent supporter of this amendment to fix the limitation of $50,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. I believe I had the honor of suggesting this amendment in the committee, and I believe in it, but I say that it can not be abused in the manner suggested.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Then the gentleman agrees that he put it in there simply as surplusage and not as a necessary part of legislation, does he? It accomplishes nothing.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Conceivably the powers given may be abused, practically, I say, they will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. I wish to propound a question to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING]. Is it not entirely likely, in connection with the gigantic operations which are such ordinary features of this world war, that some one single great enterprise will need more than $50,000,000?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Does the gentleman wish to bring to pass the result that such an enterprise may not directly or indirectly secure from the finance corporation a sum in excess of fifty millions?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. No; but there ought to be some limitation so that it could not get it all. If you think this is not high enough, make it higher.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is it not true that the avowed purpose of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts is to provide that, even under the conditions of imperious necessity that I have suggested, conditions which are not only conceivable but which are entirely likely to arise, no single enterprise, whatever may be its operations or extent or however vital to the successful prosecution of the war, will be permitted to secure from the finance corporation a loan in excess of fifty millions?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Not at all. I am not insistent on the $50,000,000 being the limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, before that question is put I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I would like to ask him if he would not agree that this may go over until to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; we want to finish the bill before to-morrow, because the postal employees bill, by order, comes up to-morrow.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Go on with the bill to-night, but leave this over until to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; we want to finish the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time its bonds in an amount aggregating not more than four times its paid-in capital, such bonds to mature not less than one year nor more than five years from the respective dates of issue, and to bear such rate or rates of interest, and may be redeemable before maturity at the option of the corporation, as may be determined by the board of directors, but such rate or rates of interest shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds shall have a first and paramount floating charge on all the assets of the corporation, and the corporation shall not at any time mortgage or pledge any of its assets. Such bonds may be issued at not less than par in payment of any advances authorized by this title, or may be offered for sale publicly or to any individual, firm, corporation, or association, at such price or prices not less than par as the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may determine.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have here an amendment which we agreed either should be offered here or put in in conference, and I think it better be offered here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, after line 8, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Any of such bonds may be issued payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys, or issued payable at the option of the respective holders thereof, either in dollars or in any foreign money or foreign moneys, at such fixed rate of exchange as may be stated in any such bonds and upon such other terms not inconsistent herewith as may be determined from time to time by the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, at or before the issue thereof. For the purpose of determining the amount of any such bonds issued payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys the dollar equivalent shall be determined by the par of exchange at the date of issue thereof, as estimated by the Director of the Mint and proclaimed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of the provisions of section 25 of the act approved August 27, 1894."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to provide for the sale of the bonds of the corporation in foreign countries, payable in foreign money, in order to cut down the rate of exchange, which is very large now in countries from which we import more than we export.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if this is a copy of the amendment which was put in the Senate bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. This amendment provides for exactly what the Senate desired to accomplish, but in conferring with officials of the Treasury Department they thought the language of the Senate bill did not exactly effectuate the object which the Senate had in view and that this does.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. HAYES. I highly approve of the amendment, because I believe it will correct a very bad condition that is at present existing so that our exporters are fleeced when they export anything to Spain where the dollar is at a discount, say of 25 per cent, and the importers again——

Mr. KITCHIN. About 24 now.

Mr. HAYES. And the importers again are fleeced in the same way. They lose substantially 50 per cent on the transaction. This is a matter of exchange purely.

Mr. KITCHIN. This is on account of the embargo on gold, I believe. Say, for instance, we sell these bonds in Spain and our importers will pay for what they buy in these bonds and the bonds will be payable in the money of Spain.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Our bonds are to be sold at par.

Mr. KITCHIN. They are to be sold at par.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But we say that the foreign money must be of an amount equal to our par when the exchange is made.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman I am heartily in favor of this amendment and I am very glad indeed he offered it. The fact is with a trade balance of $3,000,000,000 in our favor the fact that the dollar is at a discount in almost every country in the world——

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will be somewhat corrected by this amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the exchanges against us are only in those countries from which we import more than we export, and the reason for that situation was explained by the gentleman from California.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think this will have a good, wholesome effect and I am in favor of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will have.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FESS. The Secretary of State made a statement some time ago to the Committee on Foreign Affairs that the rate of exchange is so high that our dollar is worth about 75 cents——

Mr. KITCHIN. He was speaking of Spain and perhaps some of the countries where we import more than we export.

Mr. FESS. And gave it as his judgment that that was without any reason and ought not to have existed.

Mr. KITCHIN. I really doubt if the Secretary of State had studied the situation when he made that statement or certainly he did not think of the embargo on gold.

Of course, if we had no embargo, I do not see how the difference could be any larger than the amount it would cost to transport the gold over there.

Mr. FESS. The balance of trade with these other Governments is so much in our favor that—what about foreign exchange?

Mr. KITCHIN. Our dollar is at par less the little cost of transportation. It is, anyway, in Great Britain and France.

Mr. FESS. Our dollar in the countries in Europe where the balance of trade is against us is very much reduced?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What about the pound in our country, where the balance of trade is in our favor?

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean to say——

Mr. FESS. The English sterling.

Mr. KITCHIN. The English sterling—the 5-pound sterling here in this country?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that they have made an arrangement with a banking firm in this country—Morgan & Co.—to buy it up at $4.76, and that really the par value is $4.86. But for that the pound sterling here would be worth much less.

Mr. FESS. Is that remedy with us also over there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. But it is not so important with us over there, because our imports from these countries are so small as compared with the exports to Great Britain.

Mr. FESS. But this will assist in remedying it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. For a question.

Mr. HAYES. In order that I may state the situation so that the gentleman may understand, if a man goes to Spain to buy olive oil, for example, he must buy pesetas and must pay exchange and get his dollars in pesetas. If he goes there to sell anything, he must receive his pay in pesetas, and in order to get it into dollars he must pay the exchange and get it in dollars. And this will help, I hope, very materially to correct that condition.

Mr. STAFFORD. While the gentleman has the floor on the question that pertains——

Mr. KITCHIN. Does this refer to this matter?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then let us vote on this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to direct an inquiry to the chairman of the committee on a matter that has not been presented in the discussion. Unquestionably the committee considered in the committee the question of limiting the interest charge that these bonds should bear. I wish to obtain the chairman's view as to whether it was considered feasible to place any limit on the discretion of the board, subject to the approval, as this paragraph provides, of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the interest rate that these bonds should bear?

Mr. KITCHIN. We did consider it, but we were unanimously of the opinion that we ought not to put a limit on it, because I imagine it will vary at different times; and we could not do it until we knew exactly what the rate of interest on the liberty bonds was going to be that we propose shall be issued under a bill that we will soon consider.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was there any testimony given before the committee, either publicly or privately, as to what rate of interest these bonds would likely bear?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; they could not tell. They will certainly bear a higher rate of interest than the liberty-loan bonds will bear. I think they will bear a little higher rate, and the more of these bonds that are issued the higher the rate will be, I imagine. That is the reason we put in this limit of $2,000,000,000, so that they would not compete with Government bonds. Of course, the higher rate of interest the corporation bonds will carry the more they will compete with Government bonds, and there will be more inducement for one to buy them.

Mr. STAFFORD. These bonds must necessarily carry a more flattering rate than the rate the liberty loan carries, because these bonds have not the credit of the Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course they must bear a higher rate, but the more increased the rate over the Government rate the more competition there will be with the sale of Government bonds. So the Secretary of the Treasury and those interested in the selling of bonds will keep that rate just as low as possible.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MORGAN: Page 10, line 18, after the word "than" strike out the word "four" and insert the word "eight."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I know that the Committee on Ways and Means have given this bill profound study. The conclusions of the committee are entitled to great weight. I dislike to take a position in opposition thereto. Yet I am compelled to do so. The original bill gave the corporation a capital of $500,000,000 and authorized it to issue bonds in an amount equal to eight times its capital. It was, therefore, authorized to issue $4,000,000,000 of bonds. The bill prepared by the Ways and Means Committee authorizes the same capital but reduces the authorized bond issue to $2,000,000,000. To this I am opposed. Hence my amendment authorizing the corporation to issue bonds to an amount equal to eight times its capital, amounting to $4,000,000,000. First, I will state that the ratio of 8 to 1 between the capital and the amount of bonds issued is conservative and clearly within the limits of safety. The capital of the bank is not the chief basis as security of the bonds. The bank uses the proceeds of the sale of bonds in buying securities, which are not only indorsed by banks but supported by gilt-edged collateral in an amount 25 per cent in excess of the bonds. If the object is to limit the credit the corporation may extend, then the capital might be reduced to $250,000,000, because upon this capital, with the required collateral security, the corporation may safely issue $2,000,000,000 in bonds. In this way you would save an appropriation out of the Treasury of $250,000,000. In other words, a corporation with $250,000,000 of capital could extend as much credit based upon bonds as this corporation under the limitation of the committee bill can extend with a capital of $500,000,000. Either my amendment should be adopted or you should reduce the capital to $250,000,000 and let the corporation issue bonds up to eight times the amount of its capital.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will admit, of course, that these bonds will be more valuable if the amount of bonds is four times the amount of the capital rather than eight times?

Mr. MORGAN. I think not, because these bonds are amply secured. Every loan backed not only by a bank, but by high-class securities, with a margin of 25 per cent to meet possible losses. More than this, these bonds are practically Government bonds.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. In this bill we provide that the Government is not responsible for either principal or interest.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, Mr. Chairman; and if I have opportunity and time I shall move to strike that out.

Mr. SLOAN. No doubt you will have opportunity, but whether you will succeed in striking it out or not is uncertain.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I know by experience how difficult it is to change a bill supported by a committee. But nevertheless the Government is behind this corporation and its obligations. Why should you destroy the credit of the corporation by disclaiming any responsibility for its obligations? Why should you disclaim responsibility when we know that the Government is responsible for this governmental institution? It is not necessary for the Government to specifically guarantee these bonds. But by specifically disclaiming responsibility you discredit the institution in the eyes of the financial world, and warn all investors to beware.

But to go back to the bond issue. The Secretary of the Treasury, the vice president of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Warburg, and the experts of the Treasury Department ask that the corporation shall have authority to issue $4,000,000,000 in bonds. I read the statement of Secretary McAdoo. His opinion is entitled to great weight. The Ways and Means Committee is not supporting the Secretary of the Treasury. You are giving him only half what he asks. By so doing you are limiting the credit power of the corporation. You are taking away one-half of its power to extend credit. This, in my judgment, is unwise.

This corporation has a capital equal to nearly one-half the capital of all our national banks. Practically all of its loans will be made to banks, secured by high-grade collateral. Its bonds will rest upon obligations of banks, supported by securities, with a large margin to meet depreciation. While it may not be necessary to issue all these bonds, the banks of the country and the business interests of the country should feel that the corporation is in a position to meet all legitimate demands, however great as they may be.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the maturity limitations of the Federal reserve act and to regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to discount the direct obligations of member banks secured by such bonds of the corporation and to rediscount eligible paper secured by such bonds and indorsed by a member bank. No discount or rediscount under this section shall be granted at a less interest charge than 1 per cent per annum above the prevailing rates for eligible commercial paper of corresponding maturity, nor, in any event, unless such member bank satisfies the Federal reserve bank that it has in its possession for the purpose of such transaction, insufficient commercial paper eligible for discount or rediscount under the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made under authority of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McFADDEN: Page 11, strike out the paragraph beginning on line 24 and ending on line 18 of page 12.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, we want to get through. The gentleman discussed this subject the other day in an hour's speech. I hope the gentleman will not ask for that.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that the other day I discussed the bill, and many Members asked for a remedy in place of this bill. This is my plan. If the House is not interested in hearing it——

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section close in 10 minutes, and that the gentleman shall have the 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section close in 10 minutes, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] shall have the 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman expect to finish the reading of this bill to-night?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. It is very important to finish this bill to-night. The postal employees' bill, according to agreement, will be taken up to-morrow. Then there is a very important bill to follow that on Friday. Saturday is unanimous-consent day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that three pages are yet to be read before the capital issues is reached.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we are over the fight now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The capital issues are yet to come.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to advise gentlemen on this side who want to know.

Mr. GARNER. We want to get through with the bill to-night if we can.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that the reading of the bill will undoubtedly take until a late hour, until 7 or 8 o'clock. May I suggest that the vote on the final passage of the bill go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; we can do that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are gentlemen who are absent to-day who want to vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to give notice that there is no danger of losing the bill on the final vote. That is not the really important point. It is necessary for Members to stay here to-night to vote on these amendments. I do not suppose there will be 25 votes against the bill. The amendments that will be offered from time to time are the important things. Members must not think that because we are going to vote on the passage of the bill to-morrow morning that they can go home and that there will be no roll call until then, because amendments may be offered here that will destroy the whole bill. It is important that the Members should remain here during the discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman does not intend to stay until 7 or 8 o'clock to-night, does he?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. What difference does it make whether we pass the bill to-night or to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell the gentleman the difference that it makes. If we let this thing go over until to-morrow morning it will take all day. It has been my experience in this House since I have been here that we can do more work between 5 and 7 o'clock than we can do in the five preceding hours. And that is the experience of the gentleman, too.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly, when the Members are out at dinner we can work very rapidly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Seriously, I do not think there is any real fight on any other portion of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have crossed the Rubicon.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman ask unanimous consent that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to the final passage after the reading of the Journal to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will do that to-night.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will agree to do that, so that we will understand it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at the end of 10 minutes, the time to go to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment carries, it is my purpose to offer the following amendment in place of this section:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

Amend section 16, third paragraph, of the Federal reserve act approved September 7, 1916, line 2, by striking out the words "thirty-five" and inserting the words "twenty-five," and in line 4 strike out the word "forty" and insert the word "thirty."

This amendment would then simply decrease the amount of reserves that our Federal reserve banks are maintaining in gold and lawful money from 35 per cent against its deposits and reserve in gold of not less than 40 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation to 25 per cent reserve against its deposits to reserves in gold of not less than 30 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation.

This is a lowering of the gold reserves back of the Federal reserve notes and deposits 10 per cent each.

It is claimed by the advocates of this bill that there is not sufficient elasticity in the Federal Reserve System to provide for the needs of the Government and industrial interests of the country in the matter of credit and circulating medium.

If these advocates are sincere, they should indorse this amendment and thus provide the necessary relief in the present Federal reserve banking system.

In my judgment in this reduction of legal reserves it is much better that these facilities should be provided through the Federal Reserve System than through the provision of making this vast amount of liquid paper to be issued by the new corporation eligible for rediscount with the Federal reserve banks, thus clogging the Federal Reserve System and destroying its great strength, that of maintaining itself in a liquid condition and thus keep the United States out of the banking business.

I would call your attention also to the fact that while the demands of the Government in the way of borrowings are great and will continue so until the end of the war, the volume of business to be done in this country in the aggregate this year will not be much, if any larger than that done during 1917, due to the slowing down of much of our industrial situation due to familiar reasons.

Our capacity to do business can only extend to our ability to secure supplies and raw materials, transportation facilities, and so forth.

As I pointed out day before yesterday, our circulating medium is not leaving the country nor is it being buried in a hole in the ground, but as fast as the money and credit is accumulated in the Treasury of the United States it is, or should be, redistributed into the channels of business and trade to facilitate the exchange and settlement of business transactions.

I would point to the fact that the only disturbance that can take place if these statements are correct is in the clogging through rules and regulations, thus slowing up the redistribution of our finances taken into the Treasury Department through the sale of liberty bonds and the collection of taxes. I want to so amend this bill that the private investors and not Federal reserve banks will buy and hold these securities which are nonliquid and keep them by this plan out of the Federal reserve banks, which banks, if they are to continue in operation, must be kept in a liquid condition. Now, this brings up the question of the sale or disposition of the securities to be issued by this new corporation. The sale in a broad market of these securities is one of the strongest features in this bill if a market can be found.

I doubt this, however, as they will come in direct competition with a market full of liberty bonds; these bonds representing capital investment and not liquid, should not be put into the banks, but should only be held by private investors, endowed institutions, insurance companies, and so forth, because while the advances are primarily made direct to industry and banks, it is done for the purpose of aiding the Government to run and thus win this war, so that it really is the Government that is being aided.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With reference to marketing the bonds, I suppose the gentleman observed that a few days ago the city of New York offered $20,000,000 of its securities on the market and there were $110,000,000 subscribed. I do not think there is any shortage of funds in the country.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then I would ask the gentleman, in reply, what is the use of a corporation of this kind if there is such an abundance of money?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is because the money has been taken away from the ordinary channels and scattered through the country with the small investors. The object of these bonds is to gather this money together.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then all the gentleman thinks we need is a capital issues committee and not a measure whose function will be the creation of a $4,500,000,000 corporation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The credit is to be made on these bonds.

I then argue that these bonds should be sold to and held by individuals and private investment sources, the same as the liberty bonds must be sold to and held by this same class.

Now, I want to call attention to the statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury in the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee, in which he said that in all probability before we get through with the stress of this war the gold reserve back of the Federal reserve notes outstanding and deposits in the Federal reserve banks would have to be lowered. I would ask you what reserves are for if not to be used in an emergency? I would also state the fact that during the early part of the war the Bank of England reduced its reserve to almost 9 per cent. I think by the adoption of my amendment that sufficient relief for all the needs of the United States war financing could be had through the Federal reserve banks in a way that would not clog the Federal Reserve System as the placing in these banks of long-time nonliquid obligations.

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman does not mean to say that the Bank of England has any statutory reserve?

Mr. McFADDEN. It maintains a reserve. It might be called a rule or requirement.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but it has no statutory reserve.

Mr. McFADDEN. England is on a gold basis. The fact that it pays out gold as fast as demanded maintains its solidity.

Mr. GLASS. The gentleman stated that the Bank of England reduced its reserve, as if it had any statutory reserve at all.

Mr. McFADDEN. It reduced its reserve from what it usually carries to about 10 per cent under stress of demand. My point was that it is better to reduce the gold reserve requirement than it is to put the United States into the banking business, as this bill does.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether the Federal reserve banks are not required to have reserves of only 12 and 9 per cent.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; the reserve requirement of the country member banks under the Federal Reserve System is 7 per cent and of banks in cities 10 and 13 per cent of their aggregate deposits. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, strike out section 17.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks on the other amendment I suggested that if I had the opportunity I would move to strike out section 17. This section provides:

That the United States shall not be liable for the payment of any bond or other obligation or the interest thereon issued or incurred by the corporation, nor shall it incur any liability in respect of any act or omission of the corporation.

With all due respect to the Committee on Ways and Means, for which I have the highest regard, I think this is a very unwise provision. This is a Government corporation. If the United States may be called a corporation, this is a subsidiary corporation. The United States is the only stockholder. It appoints its officers; manages and controls it completely. The Government is responsible for it in every way. It is simply an instrument created by the United States, absolutely without power or credit except through the Federal Government. We could finance these war activities directly through the Treasury Department, but the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, says for many reasons it is better to do it through a Government corporation. And so it is the War Finance Corporation of the United States.

Think of it! You propose, in effect, to solemnly declare in the law that the United States will not be responsible for its own bonds and obligations. To me this is most remarkable. More than this, by so doing you greatly injure the credit of this corporation. You tell the financial world, the investors, to beware. You propose to issue from two to four billions of bonds and invite the public to buy them, but on each bond you propose to inscribe a warning to the public not to purchase these bonds. By this provision you weaken the credit of an institution to which you give a capital of $500,000,000, when the sole purpose of this vast appropriation is to extend credit. This provision will simply hamper and hinder the corporation, and whatever interferes with the success of the corporation interferes with the objects and purposes in creating the corporation. With this provision in the bill the bonds will not sell so well. It will mean more difficulty in selling the bonds, and will mean higher rates of interest on the bonds. This will be the natural and logical effect of the provision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The very purpose of this section is to give public notice that these bonds are not Government bonds. They have certain privileges, exemption from taxation and things of that sort, and the purpose of the paragraph is to let the public know they are not Government bonds, so that there would be no breach of faith on the part of the legislature.

Mr. MORGAN. I say that in effect these are Government bonds. They are issued by a Government corporation. Even with this provision in the law, the United States will and should stand behind the corporation. It would be an act of bad faith to do otherwise. You might just as well repudiate the liberty bonds or any other obligation as to repudiate the obligations of this Government corporation. It is a war institution. It will help us win the war. It is to serve the Nation in a great emergency. It is to help us fight our battles, and this Government will never permit its obligations to go unpaid, and it should not do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can the gentleman conceive of a corporation being formed where the stockholders are not liable? In this case the Government of the United States is the sole stockholder.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a good suggestion. The Government being the only stockholder and following the rule applied to corporations generally would be liable to the creditors of the corporation up to double the amount of stock it holds. This would fix the liability of the Government at $500,000,000 over and above its stock in the corporation. Of course, the capital of the corporation furnished by the Government would be subject to claims of creditors and holders of bonds. But beyond this, the Government is morally responsible for the obligations of this corporation. It will be a creature of the Government. It will be an instrumentality through which the Federal Government will do certain things deemed necessary for the national security. The Government should not evade this moral responsibility. To do so is to defeat the very ends the Government has in view. In 1916 we created 12 Federal land banks and authorized them to issue bonds. These were Government-controlled land banks.

We did not in that law declare that the Government would not be responsible for the bonds issued by these institutions. The law was silent on that point. Shall we by this provision say to the financial world that we have less faith in a Government corporation than we had in Federal land banks? I say no. This provision should go out. It is not necessary to give any specific guaranty by the Government to pay the bonds or obligations of the war finance corporation. But to declare in this law that the United States would not be responsible for any of the obligations of this war finance corporation would be an inexcusable mistake, a monumental blunder, such as I believe the statesmanship in the Congress of the United States is incapable of making.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment to correct the text.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. On line 12 the word "partnership" is used in the singular form, while the other words, "individuals, corporations," are in the plural. I simply want to have an "s" added to the "partnership."

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 12, strike out the word "partnership" and insert the word "partnerships."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That whoever (1) makes any statement, knowing it to be false, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for any other person, firm, corporation, or association any advance under this title, or (2) willfully overvalues any security by which any such advance is secured, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

Whoever (1) falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits any bond, coupon, or paper in imitation of or purporting to be in imitation of a bond or coupon issued by the corporation; or (2) passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish, any false, forged, or counterfeited bond, coupon, or paper purporting to be issued by the corporation, knowing the same to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or (3) falsely alters any such bond, coupon, or paper; or (4) passes, utters, or publishes as true any falsely altered or spurious bond, coupon, or paper issued or purporting to have been issued by the corporation, knowing the same to be falsely altered or spurious, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

Whoever, being connected in any capacity with the corporation, (1) embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misappplies any moneys, funds, or credits thereof, or (2) with intent to defraud the corporation or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual, or to deceive any officer of the corporation, (a) makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the corporation, or (b) without authority from the directors draws any order or assigns any note, bond, draft, mortgage, judgment, or decree thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to direct and use the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department to detect, arrest, and deliver into custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction any person committing any of the offenses punishable under this section.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: Page 15, line 11, after the word "by," where it occurs the first time in the line, strike out all in line 11 after the same word "by" and all in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "imprisonment for not more than five years."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have no disposition to take up the time of the committee; but the object of this amendment is to prevent anyone violating the provisions of this paragraph from the possibility of escaping merely by paying a fine. I have also prepared and have sent to the desk amendments modifying the subsequent paragraphs in the same way. It is not necessary for me to say that we have all been talking about putting people in the penitentiary who violate laws of this character, and it does seem to me that in this time of war an individual who defrauds the Government ought not to be permitted to escape merely by the payment of money. I think he ought to be imprisoned, and that is the object of the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's amendment would not leave it in the discretion of the court to impose a fine?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It would take the discretion away from the courts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman not conceive of cases where the court ought to exercise that discretion?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In such a case the court may fix the sentence at imprisonment for one day or one year or more, not exceeding the maximum provided.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas) there were—ayes 17, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have two more amendments. I do not care to discuss them, but I would like to have them offered and read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 24, strike out all after the word "by" in line 24, and strike out lines 1 and 2 on page 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "imprisonment for not more than 10 years."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 12, strike out all after "by" in line 12 and all of lines 13 and 14, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "imprisonment for not more than 10 years."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment as a new section if it is in order. If it is in order now I desire to offer it now.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I move to amend, page 16, line 1, by striking out the figures "$5,000" and insert "$10,000," and I offer the same amendment in line 13, page 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 16, line 1, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$10,000."

Mr. KITCHIN. We have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not finished reading the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And on page 16, line 13, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$10,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?
